I call the attention of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] to the report.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

Mr. GALLINGER. From the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, I am directed to report a bill, and, as I am going to ask unanimous consent for its consideration, I will take but a moment to say that under the law it is required that whenever a report comes from one of the Departments that they have useless papers which they would like to have destroyed, a joint committee of the two Houses has to be appointed to take that rather unimportant matter under consideration and to make a report. This bill provides that that shall be done by a committee appointed in the Department itself, relieving Congress from this duty and doubtless effectuating the desired purpose as well, if not better, than is now accomplished.

I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The bill (S. 6235) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the Executive Departments," approved February 16, 1889, and the act amendatory thereof, approved March 2, 1895, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act "To authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the Executive Departments," approved February 16, 1889, and the act amendatory thereof, approved March 2, 1895, be amended to read as follows:

"That whenever there shall be, now or hereafter, in any one of the Executive Departments of the Government, or in the various public buildings under the control of the several Executive Departments of the Government, an accumulation of files of papers which are not needed or useful in the transaction of the current business of such Department and have no permanent value or historical interest, it shall be the duty of the head of such Department to appoint a committee of three officers from his Department and submit to such committee a report of this fact, accompanied by a concise statement of the condition and character of such papers; and such committee shall meet and examine such report or reports and statement and the papers therein described, and submit to the head of such Department a report of such examination and their recommendations; and if the said committee report that such files of papers, or any part thereof, are not needed or useful in the transaction of the current business of such Department, and shall have no permanent value or historical interest, then it shall be the duty of such head of the Department to sell as waste paper or otherwise dispose of such files of papers upon the best obtainable terms after due publication of notice inviting proposals therefor, and receive and pay the proceeds thereof into the Treasury of the United States."

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to create a Tariff Commission and defining its powers and duties.

Some question may be raised as to whether section 5 of the bill can be incorporated in a Senate bill. I have placed it in this bill because I believe it is within the constitutional power of the Senate to originate such legislation. I place it in the bill for another reason, because it indicates my views upon a certain proceeding to secure prompt action for tariff reduction.

I shall ask the Senate very soon for time to submit some remarks in support of legislation to establish a Tariff Commission. I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 6256) to create a Tariff Commission and defining its powers and duties, was read twice by its title and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a Commission is hereby created and shall be known as the Tariff Commission, which shall be composed of nine Commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Commissioners first appointed under this act shall continue in office for the terms of three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, and eleven years, respectively, from the 1st day of July, A. D. 1908, the term of each to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed for terms of ten years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the Commissioner whom he shall succeed. Any Commissioner shall be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. No person shall be eligible to appointment as a Commissioner under this act who is a Senator or Representative of the United States or is a Senator or Representative elect of the United States at the time of his appointment. No two of said Commissioners shall be resident in the same United States judicial circuit. Not more than five of said Commissioners shall be members of the same political party. One of said Commissioners shall have a practical knowledge of the manufacturing industry; one of said Commissioners shall have a practical knowledge of agriculture; one of said Commissioners shall have a practical knowledge of the import business; one of said Commissioners shall be a representative of labor; one of said Commissioners shall be a lawyer who has made a special study of the tariff laws and customs practice in the United States; one of said Commissioners shall have a made a special study of domestic and foreign tariffs and commercial reciprocity; one of said Commissioners shall have expert knowledge of costs of production and accounting; one of said Commissioners shall be a trained statistician who has made a special study of prices in domestic and foreign markets; one of said Commissioners shall be an eminent economist who has made a special study of wages and cost of living. No vacancy in the Commission shall impair the right of the remaining Commissioners to exercise all the powers of the Commission. Each Commissioner shall receive a salary of $10,000 per year.

SEC. 2. That said Commission as soon as qualified shall without delay meet for organization in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and it shall organize by the election of one of its number to be chairman and one of its number to be vice-chairman. The Commission shall appoint a secretary and such other employees as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties and fix the salary or compensation of each. Until otherwise provided by law, the Commission may select and rent suitable offices for its use, and shall have authority to procure all necessary office supplies. The expenses of the Commission, including necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the Commissioners or by their employees, under their orders, in making any investigations or upon official business in any other place than the city of Washington, shall be allowed and paid upon presentation of vouchers therefor, approved by the chairman of the Commission. The principal office of the Commission shall be in the city of Washington, where its general sessions shall be held; but whenever the convenience of the public or the Commissioners may be promoted or delay or expense prevented thereby the Commission may hold its sessions in any part of the United States. It may, by one or more of the Commissioners or its employees, prosecute any inquiry necessary to the performance of its duties in any part of the United States or in any foreign country: Provided, That not more than four members of said Commission shall be absent from the United States at one time.

SEC. 3. That the Commission hereby created shall have authority, and it is hereby directed to ascertain the difference in the cost of producing articles of the same, or substantially the same, quality and kind in this country and in competing foreign countries. The Commission in such investigation shall ascertain, in connection with the several articles covered by its reports in the United States and in competing foreign countries, the wages, the hours of service, and the efficiency of labor employed, and the standards of living of such laborers. The Commission shall ascertain the cost of raw material, the cost of labor, the fixed charges, depreciation upon the true value of the capital invested, and all other items necessary to determine the true cost of the finished product. Said Commission shall ascertain the market conditions and the prices at which protected products of the United States are sold in foreign countries as compared with the prices of products sold in the United States. The Commission shall investigate the effect of transportation rates upon the markets and prices of dutiable products, the relation between Government revenues and tariff schedules, and shall, pursuant to the purposes of this act, in so far as practicable, make an investigation of all questions and conditions relating to the agricultural, manufacturing, mining, commercial, and labor interests with reference to the tariff schedules and classifications of the United States and of foreign countries. Said Commission is authorized to call upon any department or officer of the Government for any information in the possession of such department or officer and relating to any subject under investigation by said Commission. It shall be the duty of such officer to furnish the information required. It shall be the duty of said Commission upon petition, or upon its own initiative by one or more of its members, from time to time to hold hearings at such places as it may designate to determine industrial, commercial, and labor conditions in relation to the tariff. Such investigation shall be public, except as otherwise provided herein. The Commission shall, whenever practicable, give at least ten days' public notice of any and all hearings, and at any such hearing, whether undertaken upon the initiative of the Commission or upon petition, any person may appear before said Commission and be heard, or may be represented by attorney, and may file any written statement or documentary evidence bearing upon any matter it may have under investigation: Provided, That said Commission in any investigation may, upon the request of any witness examined as to any secret process used in the production of any article, take such evidence at a secret session: And provided, That the testimony of any witness in regard to any secret process shall not be reduced to writing, but that all other testimony shall be reduced to writing for the guidance of the said Commission in arriving at conclusions and making reports to Congress. A majority of the Commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. Said Commission may from time to time make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the orderly regulation of proceedings before it, including form of notices and the service thereof. Every vote and official act of the Commission shall be entered of record. Any of the members of the Commission or its secretary may administer oaths and affirmations and sign notices.

SEC. 4. That for the purposes of this act, in the case of articles on the dutiable list and such other articles as the Commission may decide to investigate with a view to determine whether it shall recommend that the same be placed upon the dutiable list, the said Commission is authorized to require of any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association producing any such article or articles the production of all books, papers, contracts, agreements, invoices, inventories, bills, and documents of any such person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association, and make every inquiry necessary to a determination of the value of such property. Said Commission is authorized to require by notice the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, contracts, agreements, inventories, invoices, bills, and documents relating to any matter pertaining to such investigation. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing, and witnesses shall receive the same fees as are paid in the Federal courts. In case of failure to comply with such a notice, or in case any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association shall fail to comply with any of the requirements of this act, the said Commission shall make a report to Congress of such failure, specifying the names of each person, the individual names of such firm or copartnership, and the names of the officers and directors of each such corporation or association guilty of such failure, and such report shall specify each particular in which such person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association has failed to comply with such requirements, and shall also specify the article or articles on the dutiable list produced by such person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association and the tariff schedule which applies to each such article. The information as to costs of production secured under the provisions of this section from any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or associatfon shall not be disclosed to any business competitor or rival of such person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association.

SEC. 5. That the Commission shall ascertain whether any persons, firms, copartnerships, corporations, or associations engaged in the production or sale of any dutiable article, cooperate by agreement or arrangement of any kind to control production, prices, or wages in the United States, or to control prices in any foreign market. The Commission shall also ascertain whether any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association owns or controls such a proportion of any dutiable product as to enable such person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association to control production, prices, or wages in the United States or to control the price of such product in any foreign market. In making such investigation the Commission shall give notice thereof in writing to such person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association and afford an opportunity for the parties to present testimony and to be heard in person or by counsel. Whenever there exists any such agreement or arrangement by which the parties thereto unduly promote their advantage, and whenever any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association owns or controls such a proportion of any domestic article named on the dutiable list as to control the market price of such article, and any undue advantage is taken in the exercise of such control, then, in either case, the imposition and collection of the duties on the similar imported article provided by existing law shall be suspended, and such article shall be admitted free of duty if the cost of labor of the domestic article does not exceed that of the foreign article. If the cost of labor does exceed that of the foreign article, such article shall be subjected to a rate of duty equivalent to the difference in the cost of labor of the domestic and foreign article: Provided, That in case the price of the raw material entering into the composition of any such article is not controlled by agreement or arrangement, the difference between the domestic and foreign cost of the raw material shall be added to the difference in the cost of labor in order to determine the rate of duty. In the execution of the foregoing, whenever the Commission shall find that there exists any such agreement or arrangement by which the parties thereto unduly promote their advantage, or that any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association owns or controls such a proportion of any domestic article named on the dutiable list as to control the market price of such article, and any undue advantage is taken in the exercise of such control, and that this advantage is facilitated by the duties imposed on a like imported article, the Commission shall ascertain the difference, if any, in the cost of labor of the domestic and foreign article, and also the difference, if any, between the domestic and foreign cost of the raw material entering into the composition of such article, provided the price of such raw material is not controlled by agreement or arrangement between parties, firms, copartnerships, corporations, or associations, or by any person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or association. In pursuing such investigations the Commission shall begin with the primary industries producing iron ore, coal, lumber, and other raw material from the natural resources of the country, and shall proceed in consecutive order, as nearly as practicable, from the industries producing raw material to the industries producing finished products. The Commission shall immediately report its findings and the evidence to the President in the order of the industries as herein provided, and the President shall forthwith and he is hereby authorized and empowered to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the imposition and collection of the duties provided by law on the articles in said industries, and thereupon and thereafter, as the case may be, said articles shall be admitted free of duty or the duties levied, collected, and paid upon such articles shall be the amount of the difference in the cost of labor as determined by the Commission, and in addition thereto the amount of the difference between the domestic and foreign cost of the raw material as determined by the Commission under the conditions and in accordance with the provisions hereinbefore specified. Said suspension or reduction of duty or duties caused by proclamation of the President shall remain in force until removed or modified by Congress.

SEC. 6. That immediately upon effecting its organization the Commission shall proceed to investigate and ascertain the cost of production, as defined in sections 3 and 4 of this act, of the articles included in the iron and steel schedule of the act of July 24, 1897, and shall report its findings thereon, so far as ascertained, to Congress not later than the first Monday in January, 1909. Said Commission shall likewise proceed as rapidly as possible with the investigation of the other schedules of said act with a view to reporting its findings thereon to Congress at the earliest practicable date.

SEC. 7. That said Commission shall make annual reports to Congress of its investigations and recommendations, together with the testimony and information on which such recommendations are based and such special reports as it may deem advisable. The testimony and information so reported shall be accompanied by a complete topical digest or analysis and by a topical index of all the testimony taken during the period covered by the report. Said reports, with the accompanying testimony, records, and digest, shall be printed as public documents. The annual report shall be published and ready for distribution on the first Monday of December of each year.

SEC. 8. That at all times during the session of Congress a majority of said Commission shall be on duty in the city of Washington for the purpose of furnishing information and advice to Congress.

SEC. 9. That there is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, for the purposes of this act, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $300,000: Provided, That so much thereof as may be necessary shall become immediately available upon qualification by members of the Commision.

SEC. 10. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

PERSONNEL OF THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

The bill (H. R. 17710) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Life-Saving Service of the United States was read the first time by its title.

Mr. FRYE. That bill is identical with Senate bill 5664 reported from the Committee on Commerce, and I should like its present consideration. It will take but a few moments. It has no retired pay in it and no pension. It increases the salary of the superintendents $200 a year; of the keepers, $100 a year; and of the surfmen $5 a month, and in addition gives the surfmen one Army ration, which is worth 30 cents a day. There is a present provision of law by which in case of the death of one of the surfmen his wife and minor children receive his pay for two years. That is amended by adding to it dependent mother.

That is all that there is in the bill. It is not what the Committee on Commerce reported at a former session, for the bill then contained retired pay and pension. It was sidetracked by reason of that provision. On investigation it was believed that no such provision would meet the approval of both Houses of Congress, and that this is the best that can be done. The Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service says that in his opinion it will relieve the present distressed condition of the Service.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of district superintendents in the United States Life-Saving Service shall be as follows: For the superintendents of the first, second, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth districts, $2,200 per annum each; for the superintendents of the third and ninth districts, $2,000 per annum each; for the superintendent of the eighth district, $1,900 per annum. That the pay of keepers of life-saving stations shall be $1,000 per annum each, and that the pay of the No. 1 surfman in each of the crews of the life-saving stations shall be at the rate of $70 per month.

SEC. 2. That every keeper of a life-saving station and every surfman in the Life-Saving Service of the United States shall be entitled to receive one ration per day or, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, commutation therefor at the rate of 30 cents per ration.

SEC. 3. That section 8 of the act of May 4, 1882, entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck," is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving station shall hereafter die by reason of perilous service or any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty, leaving a widow, or a child or children under 16 years of age, or a dependent mother, such widow and child or children and dependent mother shall be entitled to receive, in equal portions, during a period of two years, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the same amount, payable quarterly as far as practicable, that the husband or father or son would be entitled to receive as pay if he were alive and continued in the service: Provided, That if the widow shall remarry at any time during the said two years her portion of said amount shall cease to be paid to her from the date of her remarriage, but shall be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries under the provisions of this section, if there be any; and if any child shall arrive at the age of 16 years during the said two years, the portion of such child shall cease to be paid to such child from the date on which such age shall be attained, but shall be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries, if there be any."

SEC. 4. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the bill (S. 5664) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Life-Saving Service of the United States be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15653) to increase the pensions of widows of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, etc., and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference requested by the House of Representatives, and that the conferees be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

TITLE TO CERTAIN LOTS IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (S. 903) to amend section 2, chapter 433, thirtieth Statutes at Large, entitled "An act to confirm title to lots 13 and 14, in square 959, in Washingon, D. C.," returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the votes whereby the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed be reconsidered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the shipping bill, which is the regular order under the unanimous-consent agreement, be proceeded with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded, and the Chair lays Senate bill 28 before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 28) to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports and to promote commerce."

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if it is now in order and agreeable to the order of procedure, I desire to offer an amendment at this time.

I send the amendment to the Secretary's desk, and I ask to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. BACON. I have not indicated at what point in the bill the amendment should be inserted, but I presume that properly it would be an independent section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. If no contract is made under the provisions of this act for a line of ships between a port on the Atlantic coast south of Cape Charles and South American ports, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General in making said contracts to require that at least one of the lines of ships between ports north of Cape Charles and South American ports shall, upon each outward and homeward voyage, touch at at least two ports on the Atlantic coast south of Cape Charles, regard being had in the selection of such ports of call to geographical location and to the volume of the export and import business of the ports so selected.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I trust the friends of this bill will accept this amendment or agree to its adoption by the Senate. The purpose of it, I presume, is quite manifest. Naturally, if there are but few of these lines of mail ships, they will be located, so far as the ports of America are concerned, at the larger cities of the North. The purpose of the legislation, as I understand it, is not primarily to encourage shipping, but to open lines of communication between ports in the United States and, so far as the Atlantic side is concerned, ports of South America. It would be of little value to a large section of this country to have lines of steamships which shall touch at ports so remote from them that their inconvenience will be almost a barrier to their use—certainly for any of the heavier classes of freight.

If I am correct—I started to say "in my information," but I should say "in my recollection"—there is a large lumber trade between South Atlantic American ports and the ports of South America. There is a very large growing trade in cotton goods. As is known to Senators, much the larger part of the heavy cotton goods is manufactured in the South, while the finer cotton goods—those of lighter texture—are manufactured at the North. It so happens, as is known, I presume, to most Senators, that heavy cotton goods are used in the Tropics and in warm countries. It may be that a little is used outside of the Tropics, for the reason that they use little or no wool in their personal clothing, and the heavy cotton fabrics are those which are made up for their personal apparel. That is true of a large part of the countries outside of the Tropics. Well, the purpose of the bill, so far as it will commend itself to any of us in the South, is that there may be an opportunity for the opening of a trade in these valuable articles of production from our section of the country.

I have taken occasion once or twice before to remark upon the fact of the large naval-store production trade of our section and to state a fact—which is sometimes received with a look of incredulity, but which is nevertheless true—that in the matter of naval stores not only is the South the principal producing locality of the world, but the port of Savannah is not only the largest naval-store port in the United States, but the largest naval-store port in the whole world.

Now, if we are going to undertake legislation or the amendment of laws now existing, by which new avenues of trade are to be opened, there ought to be such an adjustment as will hold out the opportunity and promise of the enjoyment of these new advantages by a very large section of the country, which, in the absence of some such provision, will be practiacily debarred from them.

It will be seen at once that it is impracticable to ship lumber to New York and then to ship it to South America, and, while not exactly impracticable, certainly it is very inconvenient for naval stores to be so shipped. The large advantage in the direct intercommunication will be destroyed, even in the case of the shipment of cotton goods, if they have to go to New York and thence be shipped to South America. There is very little advantage, except in the matter of national pride, in an arrangement of that kind over what it would be if goods have to be shipped to England and then go to South America.

I trust, for the reasons which I have stated and which I shall not elaborate further, but which I think must commend themselves to Senators, that this proposition may be looked upon favorably.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me for a moment. I was just about to close.

Mr. FRYE. I want to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. FRYE. Has the Senator from Georgia investigated at all as to the additional length of time it would take a ship sailing from New York to enter at least one or two Southern ports?

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt it would add to the length of time; but such ships would be paid that much more on account of it. I will ask the Senator, in that connection, if there is no probability of there being any lines from the South, why should we of the South have any favor for the bill if we are to be discriminated against in that regard?

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Georgia certainly has an interest in the increase of the commerce of the country.

Mr. BACON. I understand that; but the probability is that the commerce would all be in the direction where we would get no particular benefit from it.

What I want to call the Senator's attention to is this: Of course, if this legislation were enacted, there would be great dissatisfaction in the country if none of these lines should run from any part of the coast south of Cape Charles. In order to establish independent lines, there must be very considerable increase in expense to the Government in establishing independent lines, say from Norfolk, Va., or from Wilmington, N. C., or from Charleston, S. C., or from Savannah, Ga., or from Jacksonville, Fla. To establish independent lines would cause very considerable additional expense to the Government over what the expense would be in the absence of such lines; but if a line established from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, or Boston is to touch at these ports, it will be satisfactory to our people and will be of very much less expense to the Government than if there should be independent lines from those ports.

I will say very frankly that if I supposed the possibility, or even probability, of independent lines from the South is one that is contemplated, while, of course, I share with others in the desire that there shall be lines opened between the larger cities of the North and the South American cities, I should feel very differently toward the bill. I do not, of course, desire that New York or any of the other larger cities shall be deprived of whatever advantages their location and their capital give to them; but, at the same time, if you are going into the Treasury of the United States, it is proper that an arrangement should be made by which all sections of the country shall have the benefit of it.

Mr. President, I am not speaking simply as a matter of sentiment. I am not simply talking about what may be of some little advantage in the way of additional improvements given to any port by reason of the fact that it may have this direct communication; but I am pointing out to Senators the fact that there is an immense trade in the articles which I have mentioned, which has a right to demand that it shall have a recognition when legislation of this kind is proposed. I do not demand of the Senate that it shall accept the amendment, but I am speaking of the demand of the trade of the country, the legitimate, important trade of the country, that it shall have a recognition in the arrangement which is proposed to be made by which new avenues of trade shall be opened.

Mr. President, if this were simply a speculative venture, by which it was hoped that the opening of such lines of communication would be an encouragement to production, and thereby trade would be given to these ships, that would be one thing; but the commerce or trade already exists. It is now being carried on in tramp ships. It will be very largely increased if we can have a regular line of vessels, and we would have an advantage which we do not have now of return cargoes. We have no return cargoes in the South. The tramp ships which leave the Southern ports do not come back to Southern ports. They come here from England or from Norway or Sweden or other European countries—England furnishes the most of them—and they take cargoes and go to South America. Then they take cargoes from South America and carry them back to England or Germany or other country of Europe, whereas if we had regular lines of ships, we would not only send our own products in them, but there would be a return voyage and return cargoes, which would stimulate and increase production and add to the wealth of the country. I trust that the amendment may be favorably received by Senators who are in charge of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] did me the courtesy to call my attention in advance to the amendment that he proposed to offer, and I need not assure the Senator that I have given the matter very thoughtful consideration, with a view to acceding to his wish, if, in my judgment, it were a possible thing to do so.

The ocean mail law of 1891, of which this bill is a proposed extension, leaves it in the discretion of the Postmaster-General to determine from what ports these routes shall be established, and I am sure that no discrimination has been practiced up to the present time. Bids were solicited from Southern ports, as well as from Northern ports, and while no bid was made from a Southern port, that has not been the fault of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. President, at first glance the proposition embodied in the proposed amendment of the Senator from Georgia is a fair one, but, unfortunately, there is to my mind an insuperable objection to it. The purpose of this bill is to secure quick transportation of our mails to South America. The objection that is urged and the fault that is found concerning the transportation of our mails is that they have either to be sent from an American port in slow foreign vessels or else sent in quick foreign vessels to Europe and transshipped to South America.

I have looked into this matter somewhat carefully, and I find this to be the fact: That if a route shall be established from a North Atlantic port the vessels on that route, if they are required to touch at two ports in the South, will be caused a very considerable delay and, in my opinion, under such an arrangement the mails will reach South America not much more rapidly than they are reaching there now by the slow foreign tramps in which some of our mails are carried.

Let us look at the geography of the situation. Cape St. Roque, on the eastern point of Brazil, lies far out to the eastward beyond our own coast line. Therefore ships from the Atlantic coast of the United States bound for Brazil or Argentina have to steer out toward the middle of the Atlantic Ocean. That is the route that is now followed and that every navigator will follow, unless he is compelled by legislation to take a different direction. They would have to go hundreds of miles—I have not made a very accurate computation, but I should say 500 or 600 miles at least—out of their way to touch at Wilmington or Charleston or Savannah. Because of the eastward stretch of the coast of Brazil, New Orleans, though so much farther southward, is at least 400 miles farther from Brazil than is New York.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to call my friend's attention also to the influence of the Gulf Stream, which runs from 2 to 5 knots an hour, on the coast from Florida north to Cape Hatteras and New York.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank my friend from California, who prides himself on being known as a "sailor man," for calling my attention to a fact that I had overlooked.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from California if the influence of the Gulf Stream does not also extend up on the northern coast of the United States?

Mr. PERKINS. In answer to the Senator from Georgia, I am unable to state, but it must be——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Gulf Stream does not expend itself or its influence in the latitude of Southern ports by any means. Every ship that goes to England has to encounter it, even if it goes by the northern route, and anyone who has crossed the Atlantic knows that, whichever route he takes, he is a very considerable period of time in crossing the Gulf Stream.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, my friend from Georgia is aware, as he has correctly stated, that the influence of the Gulf Stream of course materially affects the climate of the coast of Great Britain. It is also the fact that while it flows north of the latitude of Newfoundland, it does not materially affect the climate of Newfoundland or Greenland, or that of the northeastern coast of the United States. If a ship plying to South America will go far enough eastward it will lose the influence of the Gulf Stream, which is from 20 to 60 or more miles wide off Cape Hatteras.

Mr. BACON. I would suggest to the Senator, in that connection, that when the ship came back this way it would have the advantage of it.

Mr. PERKINS. After it reached the coast of Florida.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Passing from that, Mr. President, and letting the two Senators settle that between themselves, because I know nothing about it, I want to repeat what I have just suggested, that if the amendment of the Senator from Georgia were adopted, these ships would be compelled to sail hundreds of miles out of their way both on the outward and the inward voyage; and, as a result, the time they make will probably not enable them to deliver their mails or passengers in South America much more rapidly than they are now delivered in the slow foreign steamships. A mail line from a North Atlantic port, calling at Southern ports on the way out and calling also on the return voyage, would necessarily be greatly delayed.

Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Georgia on the point that the Southern States ought to have communication with South America and ought to be enabled to get transportation for their products. It seems to me, however, that under this bill we will have a line either from some port on the South Atlantic or some port on the Gulf.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, in reading the bill I notice that there is a limitation of 4,000 miles. If I understand that, it is the limit of a trip that must be made before entitling a vessel to the subsidy. Am I correct?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the minimum distance.

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; the minimum distance. In that event—I have not figured it out, but as I run through my mind the locations of some of the northern ports of South America and some of the Southern ports of North America that have been referred to—it would be impracticable at least to have a line from a Southern port. In short, a line would almost be compelled to start as far north as New York in order to run 4,000 miles to some, at least, of the northern ports of South America, would it not? In short, why was that 4,000-mile limitation put in the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was simply determined for the purpose of preventing the Post-Office Department giving this increased compensation to short routes, and it was determined for the reason that we have no present communication with South America, China, Japan, and Australasia. The purpose was to offer an inducement for the establishment of mail lines to these countries where we want to develop our trade and where we now have no communication by American vessels.

Mr. BURKETT. Then I would ask this question. I agree with the Senator as to the desirability of establishing postal facilities with these other countries, but if a shorter route could be established, for instance, from the southern point of Florida, it would certainly make a quicker mail dispatch from all portions of the United States to South America. That is what I have been thinking over—what is the object of making any limit? If there is a line of steamers starting from this country that takes mail to the countries that are specifically mentioned in this bill, what is the difference how short they make that trip, and why should they not be entitled to a subsidy? In short, I do not want to see them make a long trip and delay the mail in order to get a subsidy.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will not pretermit that discussion for the present until we can settle this other matter? I will state that the reason for making the request is that, in company with some other Senators, I am going to Baltimore this afternoon to attend the funeral of the late Senator Whyte, and we expect to leave in a short time.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator that I thought the question I suggested was in connection with his amendment.

Mr. BACON. I know, and I think the Senator's inquiry is very pertinent, and I hope he will press it and that it may be settled. I have had the same criticism in my own mind, but I am frank to say that, if the Senator from New Hampshire is not going to accept the amendment I have offered, I shall have very little further interest in the bill. I should like the Senator from New Hampshire to answer the suggestions which I made, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit him. He interrupted him while he was replying on this point. If I were not going to leave I would not take the liberty of making this suggestion. But I want the Senator from New Hampshire to complete what he has to say on the subject of the Southern ports in order that I may reply to him.

Mr. BURKETT. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have but a word more to say, and, later on, I will endeavor to reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska.

I will simply add that the south Atlantic and Gulf ports ought to have a direct line of their own to South America not subordinated in any way to any line that might be established out of New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston, or any other Northern port. Such a line, I say, ought to be established, and it would probably develop commerce as quickly as any line from a north Atlantic port. Brazil, especially, is a large market for cotton and other products, and both Brazil and Argentina for the timber of the Southern States.

Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the purpose the Senator from Georgia has in view, and if it were a possible thing to have his amendment agreed to without practically nullifying the purpose of the bill I certainly would cordially agree to it; but as we are attempting in this legislation to serve the commercial interests of this country by carrying the mails and products of the farms and mills rapidly to South America, and we are providing that these steamships shall be of the most modern kind and as rapid in their movements as the vessels of other nations, I do think that it would be a practical nullification of the purpose for which we are contending if we diverted these steamships from the normal route across the Atlantic and compelled them to go hundreds and hundreds of miles out of their way to Southern ports, to be entered and cleared there, to unload and load there, and then to some extent double on the voyage that they had made, and proceed to South America. I think they would consume several days more time than they otherwise would if no such amendment should be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. President, this is my reason for objecting to the amendment, which I have scrupulously tried to persuade myself that I ought to consent to, but I am utterly unable to see that the purpose of the proposed legislation will be effectuated if that amendment becomes a part of the bill. However, it is possible that a modification of the Senator's amendment may be agreed to later on.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I did not understand the main purpose of the bill to be that which is stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, to afford very quick mail service. That, of course, is an important element and was doubtless in view, but I understood, not only in this discussion, but in the discussions which were previously had upon other bills of similar nature, that the main purpose of legislation of this kind would be for the opening of new channels of direct intercommunication for the exchange of the products of this country with the products of South America. I am speaking now simply of this particular part of the bill. Of course that is another part of it which relates to the Pacific trade, but I am limiting it to that which I now have in view, and I have pointed out that here is a very large and important part of trade, and the Senator indicates that he himself recognizes it and has had information about the immense timber trade and lumber trade of the South with South America, and yet it is proposed to absolutely neglect it, ignore it, and practically deny it. There is not a stick of timber that will go from the South or of lumber that will go from the South that will go to New York to be transshipped from New York to South America on vessels which will trade with South America. Every particle of it will be sent in tramps, as is now done, tramps that will not come back and that will bring us no return in commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is but fair that the Senator should agree that there is no discrimination against the South in this bill.

Mr. BACON. I think there is, and I will proceed to point it out, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will be pleased to hear the Senator on that point.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. Because the Senator ought not to insist that the capital of Boston, or Philadelphia, or Baltimore, or New York shall be invested in steamship lines simply for the purpose of serving another portion of the country, when they have the same opportunity to themselves establish lines.

Mr. BACON. They have not the same opportunity, Mr. President, as I will proceed to show. But before doing so, I want to call attention to the fact that if there were any Southern lines this amendment would not apply. This amendment only applies in case there are no lines to Southern ports. So when Senators object to the provision which would require a ship from one of the Northern ports to call at the Southern ports, it is a recognition of the fact that they object to it because they think they will have it to do, and they will only have it to do in case there is no line from the Southern ports. Therefore they indicate their opinion that there is to be no line from a Southern port, and that is the presentation of the bill to us. But here is a proposition that there shall be a largesse from the Public Treasury, and while we will furnish our part of that largesse, we are practically to be denied any of the benefits of the act.

The Senator said that it was impartial; that there was as much opportunity in one case as in the other. The difference is this: There is a very large commerce awaiting ships which will ply between the Southern ports and South American ports, so far as the export is concerned; there is little or none at present awaiting ships of such a line so far as the imports are concerned from that country to the Southern States. That is something to be built up; something which must await time, and on account of which it is not inviting to capitalists to put their money into ships which will ply simply between the port of Charleston, say, or Savannah, or Jacksonville, or Wilmington, N. C., or Norfolk with South American ports—ships which, while they will have outward cargo, will for years have little or no inward cargo. That is not true of the larger cities. There are cargoes awaiting both for export and for import, and therefore it may be accepted as a certainty that for a long time, if not for all time, the more inviting field will be for ships which will ply between the large cities and the South American ports:

I do not expect to see any contract made for a line of ships between a Southern port and South America, for the reason I have mentioned, and this bill ought to be so adapted to the needs of the country and to the peculiar conditions that if there is to be an encouragement on the part of the Government in the shape of a mail subsidy, all parts of the country shall have the advantage of it.

The Senator spoke about the Gulf ports. The Gulf ports can be of no possible advantage to the South Atlantic ports. No lines running from the Gulf ports to South American ports can possibly touch at a South Atlantic port. That would necessitate a divergence of a thousand miles, practically.

Mr. President, it is not such an inconvenience for the ships going from northern ports to South American ports to call at South Atlantic ports as to present an insuperable obstacle. It would require some little time it is true, but we are not after express lines. We are after lines which will open channels of trade, give an opportunity for those who are producing in this country to send their products to markets with which they now have no direct communication, and to receive from those markets returns in the way of their products, in order that the commerce of the country in the interchange of products may be built up.

Mr. President, it stands to reason no man can doubt the fact that under this bill the inviting ports for the establishment of lines are the ports where there is large concentration of business, like New York or Philadelphia or Boston or Baltimore, and that the small ports can not expect or hope in the smallest degree that there will be any direct line. Now, if that be the case, if we are proceeding upon the theory of the assistance of the Government for the purpose of opening lines of trade, why is it that this bill should not be so framed that it shall accomplish its purpose not in a partial, but in a general way? It is not so far from New York to Savannah. Steamships are plying every day between the two ports. It takes something over fifty hours. It will not be that much additional, of course, because it is not like going in the opposite direction. It is partially in the direction. The steamers will go down to Norfolk, or Wilmington, or Charleston, or Savannah, or Jacksonville, as the case may be, and then sail in an easterly direction and resume the same route which they departed from in order to make this deflection.

Of course Senators have doubtless examined into the matter and have made up their minds about it. But it illustrates the course of legislation by which certain favored sections and favored localities in this country get the benefit of nine-tenths of the money which goes out of the Treasury for purposes which inure to private advantage, and the other section of the country has to be content with the one-tenth, or less. I do not propose so long as I am honored with a seat in this body to sit by in silence while that sort of thing goes on. Senators may go ahead; they have the majority to do it if they wish. I have not heretofore been in favor of any of the bills which were known as "ship-subsidy bills," because I thought they were not based on proper lines. When it was designed, as it has been in former bills, simply to give a largesse, a bounty, to any man who ran a ship, never mind where it went or what it carried or how long it was gone or when it would return, I was opposed to it, because I do not believe in money being taken out of the Treasury for the purpose of compensating a man to build a ship when his own personal interest will not induce him to build the ship.

When it came to the question of opening lines of trade with ports where we now have no trade, I announced, when the bill was before the Senate heretofore, that I would give my support to a properly framed bill of this kind; and if it was properly framed now I would do so, not for the purpose of helping a man to build a ship, not for the purpose of helping a man to run the ship, but for the purpose of helping the toilers of this country, who produce articles which it is to their advantage to send to these ports with which we now have no lines of communication and for the purpose of giving them the opportunity in the return trade to accumulate wealth, not for the benefit of any particular shipping line or shipbuilding industry, but for the benefit of the whole country. I supposed when this bill was framed it was going to be framed with a view to benefit the whole country and not for the concentrated interests of some particular locality.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will ask that the amendment which I propose be read by the Secretary.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Nevada if he will not withhold his amendment for the present?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. President, I have a single word by way of reply to the somewhat heated argument of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I do not think any Senator on the other side of the Chamber is warranted in charging upon any of us that we are attempting sectional legislation in this bill. I certainly have never taken that position during my somewhat protracted term of service in the Senate.

The Senator from Georgia asks what this bill is going to do for his section of the country? I have voted for a great many bills which had nothing to do with the section of country which I chance to represent. I have never hesitated to give my vote to bills appropriating millions of dollars for the Mississippi River, even though it was not to be expended for the benefit of commerce. I have voted for bills that directly concerned the Western States which had no relation whatever to the Eastern States, and I want to say here and now that there has been no purpose in my mind, or I think in the mind of any Senator on the Committee on Commerce, to frame a bill along sectional lines. We have simply endeavored to meet the requirements of the situation. Complaints have come to us not only from the Post-Office Department, but from the producers of the country, as well as from men who travel to South America, that they are either compelled to go in miserable, slow, foreign tramps across the Atlantic Ocean or else go to Europe in the costly and elegant ships of foreign countries, subsidized ships, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] suggests to me sotto voce, and then be transshipped to South America.

We have attempted fairly and honorably to meet that condition, and I want simply to repeat that if we are to establish a line of steamships from Boston or New York to South America and divert the steamers from the normal course across the Atlantic and send them to Southern ports we will get no better transportation either of the products of the farm and the factory, or the mail, or of American tourists or business men than we have at present.

I would be glad to accept the amendment, if I could do so without wrecking this bill, but I am satisfied if it is incorporated in the bill in the form presented we might just as well abandon the measure entirely.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Suppose it did add two days to the length of the journey; would that wreck the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I think it would destroy the purpose of the bill. I am free to say so.

Mr. BACON. I should not think so, by any means.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have little further to say. I do not want to get into a controversy with any Senator, especially over a matter that is sectional in its nature. I would avoid that.

Mr. BACON. I want to avoid sectionalism by putting something in the bill which will prevent its being sectional.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will read his remarks in the RECORD to-morrow morning he will see that he raised the sectional issue very pointedly and very emphatically, and, if I understood him correctly, he charged upon those who constructed this bill that they manifestly had a purpose in view.

Mr. BACON. I intended to call attention to the fact that the bill would necessarily be sectional. I am trying to keep it from being sectional.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is mistaken so far as those who are advocating the bill are concerned.

Mr. BACON. I have not imputed any motive to any Senator, certainly not to the Senator from New Hampshire, who I know to be absolutely fair in all of his impulses; and I use the word "impulses" after weighing it, because that is his natural inclination.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I know that, and every Senator recognizes the fact; but, nevertheless, the facts which I have pointed out can not be controverted. No Senator will rise in his place and say he thinks that any man who had capital to invest in a shipping line between an American port and a South American port would prefer to undertake the imperfect and partial trade of the South and limit his line to that rather than to go to New York or Boston or Philadelphia as a port. Every Senator knows that will be the case, and for fifty years, in my opinion, if this measure shall remain on the statute books, there will be no line from the South, and the only chance whatever that we should have any benefit from it is that at least one of these lines, even if you had a dozen—the amendment only provides that there shall be one—shall touch at the ports of the South. The vessels will either go from New Orleans, under the bill as it is proposed, or they will go from one of the large Northern ports. In either case they will leave the South Atlantic ports 500 miles out of the way, and we will derive no benefit whatever from the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment which I propose be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster-General, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall hereafter constitute a Commission to be known as the "Foreign Commerce Commission," and that they are hereby authorized to provide for the construction, either in the private shipyards of the country or in the shipyards of the Navy, or both, of twenty-seven vessels, not exceeding 6,500 tons capacity each and costing in the aggregate not exceeding $27,000,000; that such vessels shall be so constructed as to be useful to the Navy as auxiliary vessels, such as transports, colliers, dispatch boats, cruisers, and scouts, and also useful in times of peace in opening up new routes of commerce between United States ports and the ports of South America, New Zealand, Australia, and the Philippines; that such Commission make to Congress such recommendations as to it seems advisable regarding the manning of such vessels in whole or in part by the Naval Reserve and the leasing of them so manned in times of peace to shipping companies for the purpose of promoting foreign trade and commerce, and for the incorporation of such shipping companies under national law, and for reports on their operations.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the main purpose of this amendment is to create an auxiliary navy and incidentally to aid in the promotion of foreign commerce. We all know that we lack the ships that are necessary for an auxiliary navy, the useful ships, the indispensable ships, the scouts, the transports, the colliers, the dispatch boats, that are as essential to the Navy as the fighting ships themselves. As it is, we have a splendid Navy of fighting ships, splendidly equipped and splendidly officered and manned, but we lack the essential auxiliary ships that will be required in time of war.

NEED OF AUXILIARY SHIPS.

Recently the war board was consulted regarding the needs of our Navy in case of a war involving the defense of our insular possessions, and the report of the board was that we would require about 232 ships, of an average tonnage of about 6,500 tons, for use as scouts, transports, colliers, dispatch boats, and so forth.

We all know that we have no such merchant marine as will supply such ships, and we are in this position, that we have the fighting ships that are necessary without the ships that are essential to maintain them in case of war. In case of war these fighting ships would, without an auxiliary navy, be absolutely derelict in the ocean, unable to move. Our Navy may be compared to a man with strong lungs and a strong heart, perfect organs, without legs or arms; or it might be compared to an army without a quartermaster's department or a commissary department.

We need, above all things, a proportionate Navy, one that is perfect in every essential particular, not simply the ships that are necessary for fighting, but the ships that are necessary to sustain the ships that do the fighting, to carry the coal and supplies, to carry the men, to act as scouts, to act as dispatch boats; and without these ships the Navy would be as helpless in case of war as we would be without the battle ships or the fighting ships of the Navy.

DIRECT SUBSIDY OR A BETTER METHOD?

Now, the purpose of the amendment is to take a step in the direction of supplying this auxiliary navy. There are two ways of supplying it. One is by general subsidy. The other is by ourselves building, or, at all events, making an experiment in building, this auxiliary navy, either in whole or in part, and the purpose of this amendment is simply to enable this to be done in part. It is estimated by the Senator from New Hampshire that twenty-seven ships, costing on an average about a million dollars each, will be required for this subsidized service. The cost of this service, according to the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, will be about $3,600,000 per annum—that is, the cost of the subsidy which the United States is to pay annually for a period of ten years, making $36,000,000 in all, and at the end of ten years we shall have nothing. The ships will of course belong to the companies which have constructed them. Whereas if we expend $27,000,000 in the construction of these ships necessary for this service, we will at the end of ten years own the ships, and we will have expended less money than would be required for the subsidy.

This case does not, then, present the question of Government ownership as such, the question of the construction of ships by the Government for the purpose of engaging in foreign commerce; but it involves the construction of ships that are absolutely essential to our Navy, just as essential as the fighting ships that now exist, and of making them useful in times of peace by letting them out to shipping companies engaged in foreign commerce, and thus making them the advance agents of the foreign commerce which we seek to promote with foreign ports not now connected with this country by direct lines of transportation.

DECLINE OF MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire has commented upon the deficiency of our merchant marine; upon its sad decline. We all know, of course, that it has declined, and we all know the reason. We have been intent upon building up domestic production. We have put around the country a high-tariff wall, with a view to keeping out the products of other countries, and with a view to stimulating production upon our own soil and giving our own people the monopoly of that production; and, incidentally, it was hoped that under that process we would be able to reach such perfection in production as compared with the rest of the world that our exports of manufactured products would largely increase. Necessarily, therefore, the shipping in connection with this country, under our policy, must have full outward cargoes of agricultural products and such manufactured articles as we are able to sell in the markets, and must have little on the return voyage, for the whole policy of the country has been to promote exports and to discourage imports.

It follows, therefore, that any shipping company organized under the laws of this country, and with a view to the promotion of its foreign commerce, must meet this condition; that it must get freights upon the voyage out that will pay the expenses of its comparatively empty bottoms upon the return. It does not present the case of a full ship going and returning. The dominant party has sought and is now seeking to remedy this difficulty by general taxation, by subsidizing these shipping lines, so as to enable them not only to overcome the competition of other countries, so far as the cost of the ship is concerned and so far as concerns the cost of operation, but to overcome the subsidies which are being paid by foreign countries. We have not only to meet their subsidies, but we also have to pay an additional amount to cover the difference between the cost of the construction of the ships and the cost of the operation of the ships, the cost of construction being 35 per cent higher and the cost of operation 25 per cent higher than that of foreign ships.

Now, this is a very hard task. It will be difficult for us to promote our merchant marine in competition with foreign ships for the transportation of freight so long as we adhere to this high protective system that is intended to discourage imports, for such a system of taxation means full vessels only one way.

FAILURE OF SUBSIDIES.

We have tried subsidies. We now have a mail-service subsidy, and the Senator admits its failure, so far as the Pacific Ocean is concerned, and he seeks to increase the subsidy by doubling it in order to meet these conditions, and he says that the service contemplated by this proposed act will cost about $3,600,000 per annum, or $36,000,000 for the ten years. He cites us to the fact that since the failure of the last bill which he presented—the ship-subsidy bill of two years ago, I believe—one American shipping company, the Oceanic, engaged in the carrying trade to Australia, has gone out of existence, and it is only fair to assume that under these conditions there will be a further decline in our merchant marine on the Pacific Ocean.

We know that for a long time the Oceanic Steamship Company was engaged in trade with Australia under a subsidy which gave her $2, I believe, per mile for the voyage out, as a mail subsidy. At the time the last shipping bill was under consideration the report of that company showed that in that service they used three ships of about 6,500 tons capacity, and the operating expense for these three ships was a little less than $1,500,000 per annum, or about $485,000 for each ship. The loss in operation alone, notwithstanding the subsidy, was about $66,000 per annum, or $20,000 per annum for each ship, and estimating the loss of interest on the investment, the depreciation, the insurance, the taxes, and so forth, the average annual loss was $373,000 for the three ships, or $125,000 for each ship.

I assume that that company was as economically administered as any company can be under existing conditions, so we have to assume that the loss of every ship engaged on the Pacific Ocean will be $125,000 per annum, and that we must overcome by a subsidy. So I am inclined to believe that the subsidy granted by this measure will not be sufficient to encourage our merchant marine on the Pacific.

COST OF GOVERNMENT TRANSPORT SERVICE.

I have been curious to know, by way of contrast, what has been the experience of our own Government in the Pacific Ocean service. It is well known that we have a service of transports running from San Francisco to the Philippine Islands, and in that service there are four ships, the Logan, the Sheridan, the Sherman, and the Thomas, each of about 5,500 tons capacity, approximating thus the three ships used in the Australian service. I find that the initial cost and the cost of converting these ships into transports was approximately $1,000,000 each, just about the amount paid by the Australian service for the three ships which they use. I find that the average expense per annum of operation and repair for each ship to the Army has been about $267,000, as against $486,000 for each of the ships of the Oceanic Steamship Company engaged in the Australian service.

I have received these figures only within a few moments, and it is difficult for me to say what the cause of this enormous difference is, unless it be that the transports engaged by the Army are slower in speed and hence less coal consumption is required. But you will observe that according to these figures the annual cost of operating a ship in the Army transport service on the Pacific Ocean is just a little over one-half of the cost of operating each one of the ships engaged in the Australian service and in the ownership of a private company.

I cite this for the purpose of showing that the Government can do this work efficiently and economically. The Government is now engaged in the shipping business. The Government now has ten transports or more, the history of four of which I have given, and the Quartermaster's Department has in repeated reports to Congress insisted upon it that it would be unwise in the extreme for the Government to abandon the use of these transports. I remember at one time the recommendation was made by Secretary Root, I believe, who was then in charge of the War Department——

Mr. TELLER. I suppose the Senator will not assert that the transports are engaged in commercial business?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No.

Mr. TELLER. They are only adjuncts to the War Department.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But they are engaged in making regular trips. They are not engaged in commercial business, but they are engaged in making regular trips to the Philippine Islands, carrying freight and carrying passengers.

Mr. TELLER. For the War Department.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And ever since the war.

Mr. TELLER. Well, for the War Department, I say, carrying some passengers incidentally, but not as regular passenger service. Sometimes people get permission, I understand, to go on a transport, but not very often—only once in a while.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But the Senator will observe that the operating expense of each ship annually is only $267,000, while the annual average operating expense of a ship engaged in the Australian service owned by a private company, having a little larger tonnage and doubtless greater speed, is very nearly double that amount.

Now, while the diminution in speed and the lesser tonnage and the lesser transportation of passengers may account in a great degree for this difference, yet surely we must recognize that the Government is conducting this transport system with the greatest economy when you realize that its annual expense for each one of its ships is only a little more than one-half of the annual expense of each ship engaged in the Australian service.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator that if the Government went into commercial business the Government would have to conduct its business on an entirely different basis. It is now conducted by the Army force very largely, and without any reference to the conveniences they would have to have for passengers and perhaps for commercial profit. I do not believe it is any guaranty that the Government can conduct a commercial transaction on ships any cheaper than individuals can, or that it can do it as cheaply.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator will bear in mind that my amendment does not propose that the Government shall run these ships as commercial ships. My proposal is that they shall be constructed as a part of the auxiliary navy, and constructed in such a way as to be useful on the new lines of transportation which we are projecting, and that in time of peace they should be let out to private companies upon such terms as can be secured, manning them so far as we can with the naval reserve, so as to make each ship a training school for our Navy, and manning them wherever practicable with the surplus officers of our Navy itself, officers who are being educated and turned out every year from the Naval Academy.

In that way, it seems to me, we will simply have a floating training ship for men absolutely essential for our fighting ships. We know that one of the difficulties now with the Navy is that it is difficult to secure the men who are necessary for the fighting ships. One of the great pleas made for the organization of a merchant marine and for the subsidizing of a merchant marine is that it is absolutely essential that we should train American citizens for the sea who can come to the rescue of their country in time of war and man the fighting ships of the Navy.

Mr. President, I shall ask leave to print in my remarks the tables from the statement of the Oceanic Steamship Company, showing both the operating expense account of these ships, their annual loss, and other items regarding their operation and also the statement which comes to me from the Quartermaster-General regarding the operation of four of the transport ships of nearly equal tonnage:

A DEFINITE PROGRAMME PROPOSED.

Now, Mr. President, I can hardly hope that this amendment will be adopted as a substitute, but I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, if I can have his attention for a moment——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I simply desire to say that I think the Senator's observation on that point is grounded in good sense.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think so, for the majority is not inclined to abandon this bill. I will suggest, however, to the Senator from New Hampshire that he might be willing to add this as a section. May I have the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am listening to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suggest to the Senator that he might add this as a section to the pending bill. We need more than twenty-seven auxiliary ships for our Navy. The War Board says we need 232. The Senator's bill proposes to provide for about twenty-seven ships in private ownership that are to be subsidized. I will ask the Senator whether he would be willing to have this offered as an additional section, so that we will have these two systems on trial, side by side, one the subsidizing of ships in private ownership upon the ground that they are needed in the promotion of the mail and commercial service and in time of war as auxiliary vessels to our Navy, and the other the Government ownership of these ships as a part of the Navy, and their incidental operation by private companies in time of peace and in the conduct of these scouting expeditions for commerce, in the hope that they will establish a business which will hereafter be taken up by American steamship companies without subsidy. I ask the Senator whether he would favor adding to the bill this section providing for the construction of twenty-seven ships, or for any lesser number—three or more?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will be entirely frank with the Senator from Nevada. I agree with him that we ought to have more auxiliaries than are provided for in the bill. We ought to have had colliers enough to have accompanied our fleet in its marvelous voyage that is being made. We have them not. But I have an impression that upon consideration the Senator from Nevada will agree with me that this is not quite the place to legislate along those lines. If the Senator will assist those of us who are in favor of the bill now before the Senate to pass it and make what I think is a very desirable start in the direction of rehabilitating the American merchant marine, the Senator can then either move an amendment to the naval appropriation bill or present a separate bill, which will have consideration on its merits. I hope the Senator will not try to embarrass this bill with the amendment that he suggests.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have no disposition to embarrass this bill or to delay the Senator in securing a final vote upon it, but I regard the suggestion that I have made as of value, both in protecting our Navy and in promoting our commerce, and as the present is the only opportunity I have of pressing this view, in an amendment that is undoubtedly germane, I am inclined to press it by argument at least.

A FOREIGN COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Now, let me make another suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire, if he is willing to acquiesce in that, and that is that the portion of this amendment which provides for the creation of a commission, to be known as the "foreign commerce commission," should go in as an amendment to the bill. The amendment provides that the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster-General, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall hereafter constitute a commission, to be known as the "foreign commerce commission."

Then, leaving out the provision for construction, it would provide that such commission shall make to Congress such recommendation as to it seems advisable regarding the manning of such vessels subsidized under this act, in whole or in part, by the naval reserves and for the incorporation of such shipping companies under national law, and for reports as to their operations.

Now, Mr. President, we would have three Secretaries dealing with this question.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to interfere with the line of the Senator's argument, but I am very largely in sympathy with him, for he has struck what is the weak point in our entire naval establishment, so far as ships are concerned. We are deplorably lacking in the essentials that make a great fleet not only formidable, but seaworthy.

The Senator said the other day, and the metaphor was not too strong, that without certain auxiliary ships the great battle ships of the United States fleet upon any waters outside of our own waters, in case of any emergency, with war threatened, would be derelicts, and it is too true.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HALE. I——

Mr. BURKETT. I wish to ask a question right on that point, if the Senator will permit me. At the end of the Spanish war, I remember the Secretary of the Navy reported that we had, I think, thirty-six—possibly forty-four—of these auxiliary cruisers and transports, and the War Department had the other number, whichever it was, thirty-six or forty-four. I remember that the number was reported to Congress. What became of these transports and auxiliaries?

Mr. HALE. The auxiliary force, Mr. President, that was improvised—I use that word, because it was not much more permanent than an improvised force—consisted, with but few exceptions, of transitory ships, yachts, small cruisers that were to be used for the emergency along the coasts and in the Caribbean Sea; but when the war ended they were found to be of little use. They made up an aggregate, and I have looked over the list time and again. Most of them were of no account and have gone out of use and are good for nothing to-day and would be good for nothing in any case of emergency.

Mr. President, it is a melancholy spectacle that this great fleet of ours in this regard presents to-day. It is the greatest fleet of great and formidable ships that the whole world has ever seen. It is completely manned. It is in every respect except one the most magnificent and formidable fleet of ships that any nation has ever put upon the waters of the globe.

Admiral Converse, who knows it root and branch, has so told us, and he is right. But this great fleet, which has been sent upon its voyage around the globe, is to-day absolutely dependent upon its motion, upon its existence as a moving fleet, on the indulgence of foreign powers.

I have here, Mr. President, a list of the colliers, without which a ship and a fleet can do nothing, that are to-day in attendance upon this fleet. There are only nine of our own. There are chartered from foreign owners attending this fleet of ours, enabling it to move, making it a movable fleet, twenty-eight foreign colliers. I have a list of them here—I will put it in the RECORD—ranging from 4,000 to 6,000 and odd tons each.

The list referred to is as follows:

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, if when that fleet was ordered on this tour about the globe there had been the least menace of war from any power, no government owning one of these foreign colliers would have allowed a single ship to be employed by us, and our fleet, magnificent as it is, with any menace of war upon the sky, without these foreign colliers would be as useless and—

As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

We do not realize this, Mr. President. I go further. If any complication should arise in the voyage of the ships, any danger, any menace of war in a foreign power, I do not know but that every foreign power represented in the ships which we have hired would feel compelled to withdraw them from the association of the fleet, and we would be hung up.

It is not, Mr. President, an agreeable thing to contemplate. We go on year after year building up and accumulating these immense ships at an enormous expenditure, and find ourselves, as we would in any emergency for which the ships are built, without a thing being done that makes the ships formidable as a fleet at sea. The Senator is right in his theories. There ought not to be another ship added to the American Navy until we add something that every other power has done to make the ships formidable in case of an emergency.

My colleague is right; the Senator from New Hampshire is right; we can not do it here. I do not think the Senator from Nevada wants to embarrass this bill; but when we come to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill I hope the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Maine, my colleague, and every thoughtful, patriotic Senator will join with me to try and see that something is done in this entirely neglected field that we have rashly and in the most foolhardy way neglected and abandoned in the past. Otherwise, Mr. President, if there is any call for the big ships, and they are to protect us in case of possible war, they are absolutely worthless unless we have something with which to build up an auxiliary fleet and to supply the ships that will enable them to move in the waters of the globe. Without these foreign ships, these colliers, Mr. President, we not only could not have gotten around Cape Horn, but we could not have gotten beyond the Caribbean Sea. Nobody has seemed to realize that. But when we come to the naval appropriation bill this matter will be laid before the Senate, and we will be made to consider what are the actual needs of the American Navy.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I will interfere with the Senator only a moment. What is the capacity of one of these large battle ships for carrying coal? In other words, how many miles can it sail under its own fuel? I suppose that is worked out by the proper officers.

Mr. HALE. Yes; it depends upon how much is consumed per day, how much speed is made. There is no ship whose capacity for coal is great enough to take her without being coaled into any of the Eastern seas or any great voyage.

Mr. TELLER. You mean in the Asiatic seas?

Mr. HALE. Yes; the Asiatic seas, for if they are there they can not get back.

The battle ship Louisiana, with a coal bunker capacity of 2,500 tons, it is estimated can go 28 days at 10 knots an hour, or 6,720 knots. The calculation is about 3.66 miles per ton.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask another question, though I may be obtuse in doing it. Some of these are American ships. Are they owned by the United States or are they owned by citizens of the United States and hired by the Government?

Mr. HALE. I have submitted a list furnished me by the Department of all the colliers attendant upon the fleet and coaling them when they need to be coaled.

There are only nine of them. I recognize some of them, I think, as belonging to the Government as a part of the naval establishment. Of the others I am not certain. Some of them may have been chartered from our own citizens; but this list of twenty-eight ships, with such names as the Earl of Douglas, the Otterburn, the Baron Androssen, the Guernsey, the Earl of Carrick, and all those—even without this list sent from the Department—I should recognize as foreign colliers that we have hired and are now paying for.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I want to suggest that I was under the impression that we have ourselves built some colliers.

Mr. HALE. We have.

Mr. TELLER. Only upon this one occasion have we need for twenty-eight or thirty vessels of that kind, and perhaps we shall never need them again. I suppose the Government has established coaling stations in different parts of the world and intends to establish more. Whenever an administration has suggested that it wanted a coaling station I believe there never has been any objection to making the necessary appropriations.

Mr. HALE. Congress has been very liberal in that regard, but the object, I take it, of this stately procession of ships about the globe, this spectacular exhibition was to affect, I will not say the imagination, but our status, not at home, not with England, not with Germany—although for four or five years the fear of danger with Germany was exploited as a reason why we wanted more ships, as the Senator knows—but I take it the reason was to impress the East, the Orient, with our power. Nobody else would have undertaken to send such a fleet around the world; no other power, not even England, whose drumbeat is heard around the world, ever sent such an enormous fleet about the world. But this has been done to impress the East with our power, and when the fleet turns to come back to impress everybody as it goes along. You can not send a great fleet on such a voyage without colliers, and we have not got them.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee one other question. Is there any doubt that every nation in the world knew our naval strength just as well as we did? Was it necessary to send the fleet around the world to exhibit itself?

Mr. HALE. The Senator must ask the President.

Mr. TELLER. I do not myself believe that it was necessary. I have had an idea of my own about it. I never was clear as to why the fleet was sent, but it has occurred to me that possibly it might be not so much for influence upon the Asiatics as for influence upon the American Congress.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not want to embarrass this debate nor hinder the passage of this bill, which I look upon as of the greatest importance; but I hope the Senator from Nevada will not on this bill insist upon his amendment, though at the bottom he is striving to accomplish great good. When the naval appropriation bill comes before the Senate, I hope the Senator will be here and will help us to make some appropriation in that bill for the needed things for the American Navy which he has in his mind so clearly.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I wish to say before the Senator from Maine sits down that I wanted to ask him a question when he was drawing this picture of our Navy going around the world attended by foreign vessels. I wanted to ask if the fact of that condition was not a matter of price? If I recollect aright, at the time negotiations were being made for these attending ships, the reason that foreign vessels were hired was because there were not enough outside of a certain combination of American-owned ships so as to enable the Government to obtain ships to attend the fleet at a reasonable price. In short, the price which the American owners of ships made to the Government for attending the fleet was so high that the President and the Navy Department would not stand for it, and they said, rather than pay that exorbitant price, they would have the fleet attended by foreign vessels.

Mr. HALE. I am not making any point about the price paid. I do not believe the Government could have got colliers ample for this purpose without resorting to foreign ships. I do not think it is a question of price. If it had been, I should have hoped the Navy Department and the President would have given very large, and perhaps inordinate, preference to American ships.

Mr. BURKETT. They did offer 50 per cent advantage, as I understand.

Mr. HALE. I do not believe they could have got them for that.

Mr. FRYE. That was offered in another case.

Mr. HALE. My colleague [Mr. FRYE] says that was offered in another case, and not in this case. Undoubtedly the only question for the Department or the President was to either decide to go ahead, commit our ships to an escort of foreign colliers, or, finding the difficulty, wait, and not start the fleet. There were only two things to do, and the Department and the President decided to send the ships and to have them attended by foreign colliers.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I will say in this connection that it seems to me we are not warranted, and I for one do not feel like advertising to the world that we have no colliers here nor that we could not get them for the purpose of attending these particular vessels of ours. We did get ships in the Spanish war, and there are ships now. We have a merchant marine very large now in proportion to our coastwise trade.

Mr. HALE. That was practically a war on our own coast.

Mr. BURKETT. I understand that.

Mr. HALE. That is very different from a war with Japan.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Or a war with a very great power.

Mr. HALE. Or a war with any great power. We used all the ships we had then.

Mr. BURKETT. I am not disputing the desirability of American colliers. I have not questioned that. I think it is very desirable at least to have such a system, but at the same time I am not willing to have it go out to the world, and we ought not to send it out to the world that we are in the miserable, helpless condition that the Senator from Maine, as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, has just pictured us to be in.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BURKETT. The facts are that—I want to say this, and then I will yield—if there should be a war, I think, from past experience and also from the record that was made in hiring ships three or four months ago, that there is an abundance of vessels that we can secure if we will pay the price.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, that is not so; and when the Senator says we ought not to advertise this helpless condition that we are in—not as to ships, because we are the second naval power in the world in great ships, but as to the attendance upon those ships—when the Senator says we ought not to advertise this to the world, does not the Senator know that there is not a naval power in Europe that has not got the list of colliers that we were obliged to hire from foreign powers to attend our ships right at the fingers' end of every clerk in their admiralty department? We are not telling them anything new. They know it already.

Mr. BURKETT. Does not the Senator also think, under the prices that the owners of these American ships made and the prices that the owners of the foreign ships made, that perhaps they can draw some other conclusions why the ships of our fleet are attended by foreign ships?

Mr. HALE. The trouble is, setting aside the question of price, that we have been deficient in just what the Senator from Nevada says, in not doing what other powers have done with auxiliary ships and colliers to make their fleets formidable.

I went over, Mr. President, on the great Lusitania on her first trip eastward, and I found then that the British naval administration had shortened their policy, as they have in regard to having more big ships, and have put into that auxiliary cruiser a million and a half pounds sterling to make her a formidable auxiliary cruiser, built so that she could be used in case of emergency as a transport or auxiliary cruiser, and fitted out with small armament so as to make their battle ships more formidable. I took a lesson from that. I realized then, as I never had before, how lamentably deficient we have been by reason of the fact that we have been going on and piling up big ships and doing nothing to make them of any use in time of war.

PROMOTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am very glad to know that the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Naval Committee, is impressed with the fact that our Navy is not a well-proportioned Navy; that, while it has splendid fighting ships, it lacks the auxiliary ships that are absolutely essential to the operations of the fighting ships.

The Senator appeals to me not to embarrass this bill and not to delay it. I have no disposition to either embarrass or delay it. There will certainly be a vote to-day upon this bill, and I should like to press certain amendments which I think will serve the Senator's purpose as well as that which I have in view.

As I stated a few moments ago, I do not expect the Senator from New Hampshire to agree that this amendment shall be accepted as a substitute, nor do I expect him to agree that it shall be accepted as an addition to the bill; but it does seem to me that this amendment provides for certain machinery in the creation of a foreign commerce that will be of great service to the country in securing essential data upon this question, in forming the plans, and in making the estimates of the operations that are necessary to coordinate the different branches of the Government interested in our merchant marine in such a way as to make our appropriations here effective for every possible purpose which we can have in view.

We have three purposes in view. One is to increase our auxiliary ships as a part of the Navy; the other is the promotion of foreign commerce; the other the promotion of our mail service. We have three Departments that are connected with those questions—one the Navy Department, one the Department of Commerce and Labor, and the third the Post-Office Department. The naval service, the postal service, the commercial service of the country are all interested in the development of a merchant marine, and it seems to me to be of the highest wisdom to bring the chiefs of those Departments into a commission and charge them with the duty of making recommendations to Congress that will serve the nation's purpose in the advancement of our foreign mail service, in the advancement of our foreign commerce, and in the increase of our auxiliary navy.

NATIONAL INCORPORATION OF CARRIERS ENGAGED IN FOREIGN COMMERCE.

There is another thing I have in view, and that is this: We have been in the habit heretofore of making appropriations in the shape of subsidy without having any control, or very little control, over the corporations that are subsidized. I have for a long time been pressing before the Congress of the United States the national incorporation of the great trunk lines through which railways existing in the various States can be consolidated and made to serve great national purposes as well as to continue to serve the State purposes for which they were organized. Objection is made upon the other side of the House, often because they think it involves possibly too much control over the railroads, whilst on this side objection is made to it because they regard it as an invasion of States rights. I do not wish to press that question or to argue it now, but I wish to suggest to my friends upon this side that foreign commerce is exclusively within the control of the nation, and that no question of States rights or State control can present itself that the postal service is exclusively within the control of the nation, that the naval service is exclusively within the control of the nation, and that, if this nation is a sovereignty, it has the right to create the artificial beings that are to promote these various services. I think it of the highest unwisdom to subsidize any corporation for national service unless it is incorporated under national laws.

We have no national law of incorporation for shipping companies. As it is, any organization of men seeking to enter into a service exclusively within the control of the nation is compelled to go to an individual State for the purpose of obtaining a charter that will enable it to act as an artificial being. We ought to have a national incorporation law for shipping companies engaged in foreign commerce, and my amendment provides that this commission shall consider the formation and the framing and the recommendation to Congress of a national incorporation law. If we are to subsidize these corporations, we should have them under constant supervision and, in a measure, under the control of the nation. Such national corporations could be compelled to make their reports to this foreign-commerce commission, just as the railroads engaged in interstate commerce, even though they be State corporations, are compelled to make reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Furthermore, when we have a foreign-commerce commission organized, they can scrutinize the operation of these corporations, whether subsidized or not, and, if subsidized, they can present to Congress the facts that are essential that Congress should know in order to legislate wisely upon this subject. As it is, none of us really know whether the complaints of shipping companies subsidized by the nation are well founded or not, because we have not had the machinery essential to give us the facts upon which to base a judgment. This very Oceanic Steamship Company, which, with a splendidly equipped marine service, entered upon the experimental work of opening up a line of traffic to Australia, has made statements year after year to Congress, claiming that, notwithstanding the subsidy received, it was subjecting itself to a loss in the operation of that line, and I believe that the majority of Congress disbelieved the statement; and yet their statement was vindicated, for only a year ago they went out of the business, and these three splendid steamships are now, I am told, laid up in the harbor of San Francisco.

It seems to me that it will be a very easy matter right in this bill to take these three coordinate branches of the Government, each separately considering questions intimately related to the ocean service, that we should set their intellects and their energies to work with a view of elaborating a system that will be as perfect a means of information to the Government upon all these questions, as the Interstate Commerce Commission is to-day, and that we should provide a method of incorporation by the nation that will compel reports and give us exact statements of the operations of these companies, so that we can know whether or not these subsidies are essential to their existence, whether they should be increased upon their request, or whether they should be diminished when sufficient profits appear.

SUBSIDY SYSTEM A VICIOUS ONE.

So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to a system of subsidy, for whilst I realize that some form of Government aid is absolutely essential to the creation of a merchant marine, I think that the system of subsidy will create evils greater than those which now exist, and that they will bring into our halls and corridors an importunate class of men demanding, day after day, increasing legislation in their interest, and that they will be active politically throughout the entire country, advancing the election of those who favor their projects and opposing the election of those who are opposed to them, and that we will stand in danger of increasing the favored classes of this country, whose operations are gradually changing our Government from a pure democracy into an arrogant plutocracy.

I wish to see the merchant marine advanced, and I wish to see the Navy advanced, and I wish to see a proportionate Navy, and I wish to see a proportionate merchant marine; and inasmuch as these lines that are now projected are mainly experimental, as these ships which it is proposed to subsidize by this bill are to be made the advance agents of commerce with foreign ports—the drummers of commerce—and inasmuch as we need in order to make a proportionate Navy a large number of ships and transports and colliers now lacking, ships that we can not secure in case of war from our coastwise service and ships which it may be impossible to secure from neutral powers in case of war; and inasmuch as these ships will serve all purposes—will serve the purposes of the Navy, will serve the purposes of the merchant marine, will serve the purposes of the postal service—and inasmuch as they can be used in time of peace for postal and commercial purposes, I do not see why we should not construct some of them and enter upon the experiment.

We need more ships than this bill provides for. It provides for only twenty-seven. The war board has declared that 232 are now needed; that if we were forced to defend our insular possessions against any great power we would be compelled to have, in order to make an efficient defense of those island possessions, in order to transport troops and munitions of war and to supply scouts and cruisers and dispatch boats, 232 ships, costing on an average a million dollars each. We have not them within reach, so far as the merchant marine is concerned. In order to bring into being 232 ships of that kind in our merchant marine, we would have, according to the experience of the Oceanic Steamship Company, to subsidize each one to the extent of from $150,000 to $200,000 annually, involving an annual expenditure of from $40,000,000 to $60,000,000. That is out of the question. Whatever subsidy we have here will be absolutely inadequate to supplying the country with the auxiliary navy that is required.

We are expending to-day $100,000,000 annually upon the Navy, and we are creating a disproportionate Navy, a Navy like a man with one muscle enormously developed and all his other muscles withered and shrunk.

What is a wise thing for us to do? To take from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 of that $100,000,000 annually and apply it to making a proportionate Navy and stop the construction of these great fighting ships, either in whole or in part, until the Navy becomes a thoroughly proportioned Navy.

TRAINING SHIPS FOR NAVAL RESERVES.

More than this, when we subsidize these ships we do not place them under sufficient control so far as the Naval Reserve is concerned. The Naval Reserve is just as essential to the Navy as the men who are actively employed on the fighting ships themselves. It is necessary for us to have a large force of men from whom we can recruit in case of war, and so we have organized a Naval Reserve—not a sufficient Naval Reserve, but a reserve totally inadequate as compared with that of England and other powers—and how are we to train this Naval Reserve? We have no ships upon which to train them; and when you provide for this subsidy, do you provide for the training of a Naval Reserve? No; the only provision you have in this bill is that each ship will carry six naval cadets. It seems to me that if we own these ships that we can man them, that we can make them a training school for our Navy; that we can provide them with officers who are unable to get commands in the fighting ships now, and who are drifting into civil life; that we can man them with men who will become trained men in case of war, so that they can be transferred from the auxiliary ships to the fighting ships in an emergency, and that we will have a thorough and perfected system for that purpose. Such a Naval Reserve will simply, during times of peace, discharge the duties that are discharged by men employed in the merchant marine. There should be at least one naval officer upon every such ship engaged in the commercial service, constantly training the men and keeping them in condition of discipline that will fit them for the fighting ships when actual warfare comes.

So it seems to me, if the Senator will permit me to say so, it would be a wise thing now, at this session—and I should say upon this bill—to provide at least for coordinating these three departments into a foreign-commerce commission that will give us their united judgment regarding the action that the Congress of the United States should take upon the important question of promoting all these three services—the foreign commercial service, the foreign postal service, and the naval service—and that we provide above all things for the national incorporation of services that are purely engaged in national work and not permit these shipping companies to go to the State of least public virtue for charters to enable them to operate upon the high seas.

If you are to subsidize these ships, make them the instrumentalities of the nation by incorporating them under national law. If you are to subsidize them, demand annual reports, institute constant investigation of their operations, so that we may know whether these subsidies are necessary or whether they are pure gratuities, and abandon altogether the loose legislation of the past, which has resulted simply in the United States granting aid without proper restriction and control. I will submit to the Senator from New Hampshire later on what I regard as a moderate amendment, making no appropriation, but organizing this commission and giving it the power to consider the question of a national incorporation act for the shipping companies engaged in this commerce, and to report their recommendations to Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word in response to the criticism of my friend, the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] in relation to the remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in proclaiming to the world the inefficiency of our auxiliary vessels to aid our ships of the Navy. In doing so, I wish to read an extract from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, which has been submitted to us for our consideration.

> It has been the earnest policy of the Department in obedience to the statutes on the subject, at all times to favor shipment of naval supplies in American bottoms. In pursuance of this policy the Bureau of Equipment attempted to secure transportation in vessels of American registry, but unfortunately found this to be substantially impossible. American vessels offered were few in number, and the prices asked by them were such as to be practically prohibitive. In order to induce American ships to undertake this transportation, the Department, by express direction of the President, went so far as to offer them as much as 50 per cent above the prices named by foreign shippers, but notwithstanding all efforts in this direction offers received were wholly inadequate. In these conditions the matter of providing needed coal for the Navy having become imperative, the Department, after careful consideration and upon advice of the Attorney-General respecting the legal phases of the question, found itself compelled to contract for the transportation in foreign bottoms of sufficient coal to meet the pressing demands of the service.

It seems to me the Committee on Naval Affairs, through its chairman, has not proclaimed to the world anything that does not appear in this official document.

If my memory serves me correctly, the Government has some seventeen colliers, and, singular to say, thirteen of these seventeen colliers were built in foreign shipyards, and our Government purchased them because they could buy them cheaper than they could have a similar number built in the navy-yards at home by our own mechanics or in private shipyards here.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has made a strong plea for his amendment. If he wishes to be practical in relation to the line of steamers on the Pacific plying to Australasia, he will vote for this bill as it comes from the Committee on Commerce, of which he is a member. It will enable the Oceanic Steamship Company to resume its trade with Australia and New Zealand, and the subsidy will not amount to as much as is now paid by the Canadian government and the subvention of the English Government to the line of steamers plying between Vancouver, Victoria, British Columbia, and Australia. If my friend will be practical in what he desires to do in the way of direct legislation, he will vote for this measure, which will enable these ships which are lying at anchor in the Bay of San Francisco to renew their service. We have that assurance from the owners of the Oceanic Steamship Company; and had the Senator from Nevada voted with us last year the line would not have been discontinued.

As is well known, it costs about 30 to 35 per cent more to construct ships in the United States than it does in foreign countries, and it costs us to operate them about 50 per cent more. The line of steamers running from San Francisco to Australia and New Zealand pays $45 for its sailors and firemen, while other ships operating between Victoria and Australia via the Hawaiian Islands pay only about 50 per cent of that amount. This bill is a practical measure. As the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] said, it does not reach far enough, but it is a step in the right direction, and I believe its passage will enable us to establish one line, or two of them, to Buenos Aires or some other South American port, and resume the line of ships to Australia.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I desire to ask a practical question of the Senator in charge of this bill. Before doing so it is not improper, I think, for me to say that I am in favor of paying liberally, even generously, for mail service where it is necessary. I am, however, opposed to the payment of a subsidy or a mere gratuity for the carriage of the mails. My position upon that question rests upon the broad ground, which I shall not stop to elaborate, that there is no authority under the Constitution or in good conscience to levy a tax upon the whole people for the benefit of a few of them.

The inquiry to which I invite the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire is this: It seems that under the act of 1891 we pay $4 a statute mile to the 20-knot American mail steamships of a certain kind, and we pay $2 a mile for steamships of 16 knots or over. Now, under this bill it appears to be the intention to pay for certain service—that is, a service to South America, to the Philippines, to Japan, to China, and to Australasia, at the rate of $4 a mile, though the ships which will engage in that trade will be ships of the second class under the act of 1891. If I am in error about that, I should like to be corrected, because I profess no special knowledge on this subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Texas has stated precisely what is intended.

Mr. CULBERSON. The inquiry is this: Are we, therefore, paying what the service is worth, measured by the law of 1891, or are we paying or intending to pay the owners of those vessels in the trade provided for in the proposed act more than is a reasonably fair price for the service? In other words, Mr. President, is it in fact a gratuity which the Government proposes to turn over to the owners of the steamships which it is proposed shall ply in the trade with the countries mentioned in the proposed act?

Now, that, I think, is a practical question, and my vote upon this measure will depend upon a correct solution of the inquiry.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in reply to the practical question of the Senator from Texas I will say that it is quite impossible to determine with exactitude whether or not this compensation precisely equalizes the cost. However, we do know that the amount paid to the 20-knot steamships, $4 a mile, is less by almost $200,000 than they would receive if they carried the mail at the pound rates.

Then, again, I want the Senator from Texas to remember that the Postmaster-General is not required to pay the full amount. He can make such contract as in his judgment is a fair one.

Mr. CULBERSON. It merely authorizes him.

Mr. GALLINGER. As an illustration, the Ward Line to Cuba and Mexico is entitled to $2 a mile under the act of 1891, but it is receiving only $1 a mile. The Postmaster-General perhaps drove rather a sharp bargain with the company, but he is getting the mails carried for that amount. The Red D Line to Venezuela, as I remember, is entitled to $1 per mile, and it is getting 66⅔ cents.

So it is not an absolute requirement on the Department that the amount named shall be paid. My impression is that on these long routes—and the Senator will recall the fact that they are very long and expensive routes—$4 a mile will not more than pay the expense. We do know that the Oceanic Line across the Pacific lost between three and four hundred thousand dollars a year on the $2 a mile basis, and its ships are now tied up in San Francisco. They have been out of commission since last April. I think the compensation, even though——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does the Senator mean to suggest that it is the purpose of this bill to pay the entire expense of running ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, not at all. But what I do mean to say is that the Oceanic Line, running across the Pacific, received $2 a mile for the carriage of the mails, and yet lost between three and four hundred thousand dollars a year and had to abandon the contract.

Mr. CULBERSON. Did it lose that much simply by reason of the service of carrying the mail?

Mr. GALLINGER. They lost that by reason of the service. They would have lost much more if they had not received something from the Government. But they were utterly unable to continue the employment of the ships.

Mr. CULBERSON. My inquiry had in view an effort to secure information as to whether or not $4 a mile for these particular ships that are to be used in the service covered by this bill would or would not exceed the fair value of the service for carrying the mail.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do know that in the case of the 20-knot ships, if they were paid the statutory rate per pound, they would have received much more than they are receiving now. Of course it will depend a good deal upon the amount of mail that is sent, and I will say to the Senator that it will not disturb me at all if they receive a little more than they would receive under the pound rates. If we are going to have ships, if we are going to carry our mails to South America direct and to Australasia, we must legislate in a spirit of some degree of generosity so as to enable those ships to be constructed and operated. I think it is impossible for anyone to figure out mathematically precisely what it will cost and precisely the relation between the amount paid by the Government and the cost of carrying the mails.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator will recall, I hope, that I stated that personally I was in favor of paying liberally and even generously for carrying the mails, but what I objected to, and what I was trying to discover was whether or not there was any mere subsidy or gratuity in this measure, to which I would be opposed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there is not in this bill a subsidy or gratuity enough to disturb any Senator. It surely must be very slight, if there is any, excessive payment, and I feel sure that the amount named in the bill will be absolutely required if we are to get these lines of steamships.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, just one word in answer to the Senator's question. I spent at least four months in preparing the bill which became a law in 1891. I had experts from all over the country in order to ascertain what premiums, or subsidies, if you please, ought to be paid in order to induce the building of the necessary ships and the sailing of them. As the bill passed the Senate the 20-knot ships were entitled to receive $6 a mile and the 16-knot ships were entitled to receive $4 a mile, the same as is provided in the present bill. Both were cut down in the House of Representatives, the six to four and the four to two, I believe.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. FRYE. The result shows that I was entirely correct in the estimates which I had made, because we obtained no 20-knot ship except in the American Line, and only obtained those by admitting to American registry two foreign-built ships which they were running. They have lost money in carrying the mails at the rate of $4 a statute mile, and have no desire whatever to renew any contract. One of the reasons is that our contract requires the same service in the winter that it does in the summer, while the foreign contracts allow less frequent running of their steamships in the winter than in the summer. Under the second clause there were no ships at all obtained.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Do I understand the Senator to say that it is his belief that they lost on the carrying of the mail; that they did not get what the carriage of the mail cost them?

Mr. FRYE. They did not get what they would have obtained if they had simply carried the mail by weight. What made it so much the worse for them was that the Post-Office Department required the same service in winter as in summer, when there are much fewer passengers, as the Senator knows, traveling in winter.

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. As to the 14-knot ships and the 12-knot ships the amounts were not cut down in the House at all, where a cut could have been made without any great difficulty on account of the slowness of the speed required. A 16-knot ship requires 144 tons of coal a day, and it requires about fifty men to handle that amount of coal. The 20-knot ship requires 300 tons of coal a day and 100 men to handle the coal. As you go up in the ratio of speed required the increase of coal consumption is very great. It goes up almost in geometrical progression.

If that bill had become a law as it passed the Senate, I have no doubt we would have enough ships as auxiliaries for our Navy to-day. The cut was not made elsewhere with good judgment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, for a good many years I have been anxious to vote for something that would really assist American shipping. I have voted sometimes for these propositions and sometimes against them. I think I voted against the last bill, the one the Senator speaks of.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator voted for the one in 1891, which became a law.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; perhaps I did at that time.

The trouble here, it seems to me, is that there is not any guaranty in the bill that we are going to get anything out of it. Possibly you will get a line from New York and maybe one from Philadelphia, but I do not believe you will get one from any other part of the country under this bill. I do not believe it is necessary in our intercourse with South America to have particularly fleet ships. I think slower ships will answer our purposes, and we would be very much more apt to get a slow ship than a fast one. I do not think I know enough about it to know exactly what should be the speed of the ship. I have been largely following the Senators from the Atlantic coast on shipping matters, when they did not get up what I considered an unfair subsidy bill. I confess I have some prejudice against subsidies, and yet I am like the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]—I am willing to very liberal in paying for the carriage of the mail. I would not stand so much on the price if we could secure the service.

The suggestion has been that we ought to secure service from some Southern port. It seems to me the only way to build up a trade between this country and South America is to get a line from some Southern port where they can furnish a large amount of freight—cotton goods and other articles, and particularly lumber. I hope that something may be done in the way of an amendment to the bill which will secure an opportunity to the people in some of the Southern ports to have access to South America.

I am not particularly impressed with the Asiatic trade. I do not believe it is so valuable as the South American trade, and I do not believe we are ever going to have such a great trade with the Asiatic countries as some people claim and hope. Possibly it may be a great trade some time, but it will not be for some years to come. I think South America is open to us now as perhaps it never has been before, and if the Senators in charge of the bill can devise some method which will seem to operate fairly upon all the ports of the United States, and give each section a fair opportunity, I shall be in favor of the bill; if not, I shall not be.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, at the beginning of the session to-day I asked a question and then gave up the floor to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who wanted to address the Senate upon an amendment which he had, in order that he might get away, as he suggested. I asked why the words "four thousand miles," in line 8, were put in the bill, and so far I have not had an answer to it.

I confess that I do not know altogether just what connection this bill may have with the law already upon the statute books, but, as I suggested in the few words I said, if we are to have a law of some sort that will encourage a steamship line between here and South America, I am willing to leave to commerce and the exigencies of the trade where that line shall start and where it shall end. I have not much doubt in my own mind as to where it will start. I have not much doubt as to where it will go. But unless it is essential, by reason of the law already on the statute books, that we should limit it to a certain number of miles, it seems to me we might be charged, to say the least, with having fixed a minimum that would necessarily start the route far enough north of the Equator and wind it up far enough south of the Equator so as to be calculated, in effect, to locate it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I may not have understood the Senator from Nebraska correctly, but I got the impression when he raised this point before that he thought the 4,000-mile limit might shut out some of the Southern ports. Did I understand the Senator correctly on that point?

Mr. BURKETT. I said it might shut out some of the Southern ports of our country in connection with some of the Northern ports of South America.

Mr. GALLINGER. The fact is that from New Orleans to South America is at least 400 miles farther than from New York, so that the 4,000-mile limitation can not possibly operate against them.

I will repeat what I tried to say previously, if the Senator will permit me a moment, that the 4,000-mile provision is simply to make the ships in a sense earn their money. We have a line to Central America—Venezuela—a slow service, it is true, called the "Red D Line," and that line receives $2 a mile. If we should undertake to give $4 a mile to lines running a shorter distance than 4,000 miles, we would be overpaying them, and the countries where we want to develop our trade—South America and the trans-Pacific countries—are four thousand and more miles away. For that reason the limit was placed. It covers the points south of the Equator on the Atlantic, and Japan, China, the Philippines, and Australasia, across the Pacific.

There was a well-defined purpose in it, and I feel sure that when the Senator thinks it over carefully he will not have any criticism to make as to the wording of the bill in that particular.

Mr. BURKETT. I had supposed there was a well-defined purpose in it, and a purpose that was entirely proper, I may say, but I did not understand what the purpose was. But I still submit that if there is one thing we want it is quick transportation between here and South America. We are troubled now because of the fact that it takes longer to get our mails and freight and passengers to South America than it does to get their mails and freight and passengers from Europe. We have to go to Europe now in order to get to South America comfortably or expeditiously. We have to travel the two sides of the triangle when we go to South America, while Europe travels only one side. It seemed to me it was not very particular where that great port on the coast of South America should be builded up.

If we start out on this plan undoubtedly it will help to build up somewhere on the coast of South America a great port, and from that great port, in course of time, are going to radiate the railroads and the other lines of transportation, whatever they may be, throughout the continent of South America. In short, we may be helping to locate by this legislation the future great port of entry for South America, and thus, indirectly, the course of the transportation lines that are to be the great distributers.

Now, it seems to me, that what we are interested in is in getting that port just as close to North America as it is possible to get it rather than to get it 25 or 30 degrees south of the equator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, the Senator knows that Rio and Buenos Aires are now the great cities in South America, and they are the points from which commerce will flow. I feel very sure that we are not going by this bill, whatever its provisions may be, to build up any other great city in South America, and I repeat that it is a proper provision that these vessels shall make these long voyages, because if they were to make shorter voyages the compensation would not need to be as large. But it would not accomplish the result we are aiming at. We want to establish a trade with the chief cities of South America and with the countries across the Pacific.

Mr. BURKETT. Well, I submit this proposition. I confess I have not had time to make calculations, and I have not the figures, but certainly some of the Southern ports along the Atlantic coast are less than 4,000 miles distant from some of the South American ports.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator sure of that?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; I am sure of it, because——

Mr. GALLINGER. It is 5,000 miles from the Atlantic coast to Rio de Janeiro. It is 6,000 miles to Buenos Ayres. Is the Senator sure that we are neglecting any place——

Mr. BURKETT. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I say it is 5,000 miles to Rio and 6,000 miles to Buenos Ayres.

Mr. BURKETT. That is from New York?

Mr. GALLINGER. From the Atlantic or Gulf coast. Is the Senator sure that there is any place we are neglecting that is a thousand miles nearer us than Rio or 2,000 miles nearer us than Buenos Ayres?

Mr. BURKETT. All the coast this side of the Amazon River would be a great deal nearer the Southern ports. But I will not discuss that.

Probably there is nothing improper in this, but I did want to call attention to it for this reason. Those of us who do not believe altogether in a ship-subsidy plan, as some of the Senators do, are constantly reprimanded for our position, as I think has been mildly done this afternoon. We are more or less blamed for the condition not only of our shipping, but for the condition of the auxiliaries of our Navy.

The Senator from Maine this afternoon pictured our helpless condition by reason of not having auxiliaries attending the United States Navy in its trip around the world. I could not help but think as he was speaking that either that distinguished Senator or his illustrious predecessors have written every syllable, so far as I can find out (and I took some pains a year or two ago to investigate it), that is on the statute books of the United States pertaining to the American merchant marine.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator that in writing these provisions I have done it in protest constantly against propositions for unduly increasing the number of battle ships, the big ships of the Navy, to the exclusion of these auxiliaries and the ships that are necessary to make the fleet efficient. I have not had my way about the Navy.

Mr. BURKETT. I think the Senator perhaps——

Mr. HALE. I have done the best that I could. And let me say to the Senator that if trouble should arise to-morrow about our insular possessions in the Pacific we could not get a battle ship there. Some of us have been trying for years to get an auxiliary Navy, merchant ships that would be useful not only in time of peace as a part of the merchant marine, but would help in case of friction with foreign nations, that would be an auxiliary Navy in war. We have not been able to get it.

When this emergency is so accentuated by the passage of this monster fleet about the world and its dependence upon foreign auxiliaries, we ought not to let the opportunity pass without doing something to build up what is not only essential for the merchant marine, but for the Navy.

Mr. BURKETT. I think, Mr. President, the Senator did not quite catch the point I was trying to make. It is that those Senators and those Representatives in Congress who have been opposed to the propositions for an enormous ship subsidy in the past are always complained of because there is not an American merchant marine, and incidentally and collaterally thereto we are blamed because we have not colliers to attend our ships. What I was going to say, in addition, is that the Senator from Maine and his colleague and their predecessors have written practically every syllable of the law of the United States with reference to a merchant marine, both coastwise and foreign, and if those laws are bad and if they have prevented us from having a merchant marine, they can not blame the Senators and Representatives from the prairie States for being responsible for it.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I think I have had the honor of writing most of these bills, and the Senate has passed them, and they have been destroyed practically in the House of Representatives, not in the Senate. If the bill which was reported, and which passed the Senate in 1891, had become a law as it passed the Senate, my colleague from Maine would not to-day be talking about the necessity of auxiliary cruisers for the Navy; we would have had plenty of them.

The Senator must observe still further that in every bill which has passed the Senate to revive the merchant marine there has been a provision that every ship should be so constructed as to meet the approval of the Navy Department, so that the ships might be of practical use in case of war. These are required to be built in that same way under the act of 1891, which the bill amends. They must be built to the satisfaction of the Navy Department, so as to be converted into cruisers at once. The American line was built in that same way. Those that were taken into American registry, having been built in England, were repaired in such a way as to make them efficient naval cruisers, and in the war with Spain they were all in the war as cruisers—every one of them—and they did magnificent service.

Mr. BURKETT. Well, Mr. President, the Senator must admit that while he has failed in getting some legislation through that he thinks might have helped the merchant marine, nevertheless there has been some legislation passed. There is some that dates back to 1792; and if you will follow the legislation from that period down with reference to the merchant marine you will find that it has been written absolutely by the men from New England. If the result of it is bad they must not blame us from the prairie States for being responsible for that condition.

I am not going to-day at this hour nor on this bill into a discussion of any particular legislation that in my opinion has had a great deal to do with preventing America from having more of a merchant marine. I might say, however, just in passing that on account of the laws that are on the statute books, which have been written by the men from the section of country that I suggested, in the interest apparently, as we have always said, of the merchant marine, it would not be possible to-day for an American citizen to start a ship under an American flag, if he had $5,000,000,000, within eighteen or twenty months. That is the condition we are in under those laws. He could not do it. It is an absolute impossibility.

The trouble with the shipping legislation of this country is that it has always been made in the interest of the shipbuilder instead of the ship operator. If you take the hearings of all the committees that have ever been held in a hundred years of Congress on this matter, you will find but one time, and that was at the time of the Hanna-Frye bill a few years ago, when a ship operator ever came before a committee of Congress and said that, in his opinion, a ship subsidy would build up the American merchant marine. I do not know just why at that time they all agreed in their opinion, but that was the first time a ship operator ever came before Congress and said that a ship subsidy would help build up the merchant marine.

Every statute has been made, I say, in the interest of the man who builds the ship, not in the interest of the man who is going to operate the ship. Every law that has been placed on the statute books has forced the man who is going to operate the ship to build the ship in some particular locality, and thus has handicapped the man who is to own and operate the ship at the very beginning.

I will say that I am not one of those who criticise what is done along this line entirely. I agree that, to as great an extent as is possible and practicable, we ought to protect the American shipbuilder. I believe in protecting every American industry just as much as we can reasonably. I believe that where we can we ought to compel the man who is going to sail a ship under the American flag to build it in America and with American labor. But I am getting tired of having men continually stand up and criticise in public and private the men who come from the prairie States, as if we were responsible for America not having a merchant marine, when, as a matter of fact, we never have written a syllable or never have pretended to write a syllable of the merchant-marine laws of the United States.

Senators speak as if we did not have any merchant marine, and yet we have a merchant marine floating between the various ports on our own coast that is larger than that of most of the nations of the world. We protected the shipbuilder there by compelling every one of those ships to be built in America before it could operate between the ports of America. That is a possibility. We have done that successfully, and thus we have encouraged shipbuilding.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BURKETT. Just a sentence, and then I will yield. We have also provided, or undertaken to provide, that if a man is going to run a ship between here and some place else in the world, he must build it in America—that is, we have said if he is going to run it under an American flag he must build it here. What has been the result? Why, he has bought his ship elsewhere, because he could buy it cheaper, and sailed it under a foreign flag, because he could not get an American register. It has prevented us from having an American merchant marine, and it has not helped our shipbuilders. That policy does not build up a merchant marine and does not give the American builder any ship to build. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, in speaking of the coastwise trade, forgot to suggest a most important reason why that is prosperous, and that is that it is protected by the statutes of the United States to such an extent that no foreign ship is permitted to compete with the American ship. Foreign ships are absolutely prohibited. That may be called a "subsidy," or whatever the Senator chooses to call it, but it is the most thorough protection to American shipping that ever could be thought of. That is the reason why we have a prosperous coastwise marine and an utterly dilapidated and inadequate foreign marine, the latter not being protected at all.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator that is exactly what I was trying to explain. I was trying to explain that the men who had written the shipping laws of this country had tried to build up a foreign merchant marine on exactly the same kind of laws that they had built up the coastwise merchant marine, and it has not worked because we can control the ports at only one end of the line in foreign commerce, while in coastwise trade we control all the ports.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would not work, because we did not protect it sufficiently. The truth is, as I have already suggested, we have not protected the foreign merchant marine at all.

Mr. BURKETT. The facts are that we have gone wild in this country in our shipping legislation in protecting the man who builds the ship or in attempting to protect him. I do not believe we have helped him much. For example, we have a law on our statute books that provides that when a ship is wrecked and needs 75 per cent repairs (I do not know that I have the percentage right), it can be repaired here in America and get an American flag. I do not know that I have it right.

Mr. FRYE. There is no such law on the statute book.

Mr. BURKETT. Then I will say we have passed special laws permitting ships that are practically all repaired in the United States or repaired to a certain per cent of their value to obtain an American flag. Yet I have heard Members of Congress stand up and haggle and contest and dispute the amount of repairs to a penny's certainty to see that they reached a certain amount before they would be willing to give an American flag, before they would be willing to permit a man who had the money and had spent practically all of it here in the United States, to have an American flag.

Now, let me call the Senator's attention to another thing that I spoke of a moment ago. When the Spanish war closed the War Department, I think, had forty-four vessels that it had bought during the Spanish war to attend the American warships and for transport purposes. The Navy Department, I think, had thirty-six vessels. That is about the number. I may not be accurate, because I have not looked it up recently. I had not expected to say anything on this subject and hence have not verified my figures, but I got into the discussion this morning.

When that war was over, the Secretary of War reported these ships to Congress, and made the statement that while in the service of the United States they could carry an American flag, notwithstanding they were foreign built, that, if he undertook to sell them, he could not give an American flag with the ship. And he said it would probably make a good deal of difference in the amount that we would be able to sell those ships for if we did not give a flag with those ships, or give an American registry, which means an American flag.

Now, what was the result? Nothing was done. So intent on carrying out the policy that has always seemed to prevail in shipping legislation in this country to protect the shipbuilders alone, we would not give a flag and registry to those ships.

I do not know what the result of that was in the actual sale of those ships. I have never followed it up. I have been ashamed to follow it up, for we were in the ridiculous attitude of going about the world hawking off some ships we had to sell and refusing to give them a flag or registry. We wanted to sell to somebody and let some other country give them a flag. That was the pitiful, ridiculous position that the American Government was assuming at that time, all under the guise of protecting the shipbuilder in this country.

So I say the condition of our merchant marine is not the fault of the men who come from the center of this country, and you must not complain of us if the United States does not have a merchant marine, and you must not complain of us if we do not have colliers to attend the American Navy, because I say you from New England have written every single syllable of every statute that has ever been enacted on this subject.

As I said a few minutes ago, in reply to the Senator from Maine, at the time it was sought to get some boats to attend the American war ships bids were invited and all except the eight or nine boats of American register made a combination apparently and put up the rates to a prohibitive price. I do not know it was ever proven that there was a combination, but they set a price so high and with apparent uniformity that the Department and the President would not consent to pay it. Foreign ships bid lower and, if I remember aright, the President and the Department decided to pay 50 per cent more for vessels that were carrying the American flag or vessels of American registry, but they would not come to that price. They would not take 50 per cent more than foreign ships would do the work for. They thought perhaps that we would not send those battle ships attended by anything except American registered boats and that they could force the Government up to their price. But the President had the courage at that time not to be held up, as it was a hold up, in my opinion, and he hired boats and colliers under foreign flags to attend the fleet. That is the way I understand that proposition, and that is why we have foreign colliers attending our fleet. It was not because we did not have the ships under American registry, but because they wanted too exorbitant a price for their services.

If at the time we gave American-registered and American-built vessels an absolute monopoly of the American coastwise trade we had provided in those laws the same provisions that we now seem to want to provide for when we undertake to subsidize a foreign merchant marine, I surmise the President would have had some power to have commanded some of those vessels that he needed. He would have had vessels that would have been eligible for that service that are now in the coastwise trade, and would have had power to have prevented the combination of those ship operators in the coastwise trade of this country for forcing unreasonable prices for their use as colliers.

I am willing to accept the explanation of the Senator from New Hampshire as to the "4,000 miles," but it seemed, perhaps, at first thought, to have been intended to make the north end of the line as far as New York or Boston, or somewhere up there, necessary in order to get the 4,000 miles. I must say I have been in favor of striking that matter out, and so it seems to me yet, because it is only thirteen or fourteen hundred miles between our Gulf coast towns and the South American ports immediately across the Gulf.

For one, I say I want to build up a quick service between here and South America, and if we can start 1,300-mile vessels between the southern part of the United States and the northern part of South America, and if from those two ports can be hooked on a transportation system ramifying each country that will give a still quicker and faster service for the business of North America and South America, then I would a little rather pay a subsidy on a 1,300-mile line than to pay it for a 4,000-mile line, if that meant slower service. In short, it is results that I want; it is the quickest service that I am after.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think it is important to put this in the RECORD in connection with this debate. I have ascertained the distances that the ships will travel if they are built and operated.

The distance from New York to Rio de Janeiro is 4,778 nautical miles.

New Orleans to Rio de Janeiro, 5,228 nautical miles.

Boston to Rio de Janeiro, 4,748 nautical miles.

Savannah to Rio de Janeiro, 4,742 nautical miles.

Key West to Rio de Janeiro, 4,896 nautical miles.

Mobile to Rio de Janeiro, 5,215 nautical miles.

So New Orleans and Mobile are almost 500 miles farther away from Rio than New York, and almost exactly 500 miles farther away than Boston.

Mr. BURKETT. That is from Rio. Of course there may be some other ports this side.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, Pernambuco; but Pernambuco is a way station at best.

Now, Mr. President, I believe that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] is to offer the amendment that his colleague suggested, and I have a substitute to offer for that which I think is going to be accepted by everybody, and I should like to make some progress in agreeing to these amendments.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission——

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator defer that until I make a few brief statements in reply to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will be pleased to do that, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I will give way.

Mr. BURKETT. Will the Senator let me add a word or two? I was taken off the floor by these interruptions before I had quite finished.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly. I thought the Senator had finished his remarks.

Mr. BURKETT. It will not be over a minute.

This bill has not presented itself to me as the ordinary ship-subsidy bill. Heretofore I have always opposed the great propositions of subsidy, because they have generally been intended to subsidize a line of ships going across the Atlantic Ocean or somewhere where we were not particularly needing transportation lines and mail facilities, and where, in fact, ships were going in ballast. I stood out against that sort of subsidizing where they already had more ships apparently than business demanded. But it is essential, as I have thought for a good many years, that we should get in closer commercial relations with the people on the Western Hemisphere.

The bill, if it shall be perfected, as it seems to me it is going to be—it seems to me that it will, in some degree at least, meet a necessity that has confronted us here in the United States for a good many years. It will establish business connection directly with the people of South America and will open up a market that we can well afford to look after and cultivate, and a market that it is absolutely impossible to cultivate or to get without better transportation facilities.

Therefore I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that while I thought those lines ought to go out, with his explanation, and having every confidence not only in his judgment, but certainly in his integrity, I am willing to leave those words in. I am not certain they are wrong; I might be wrong in my judgment in the matter. I will support the bill with them in if, as I say, it is otherwise properly perfected.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the point suggested by the Senator from Nebraska as to why the Representatives in Congress from the interior States should support a shipping bill is not new, and it is just such suggestions as have been made by the Senator from Nebraska that are calculated to put Members of Congress on the defensive for having supported these measures where such Members are from the interior States.

Any law that is enacted should go to the people carrying its own justification with it. Those who participate in the enactment of a law should be so protected by the terms of the enactment and the discussion which accompanies the enactment of the bill that they will not be called to account for having been untrue to their section of the United States.

Mr. President, I supported every ship-subsidy provision, if I may use or misuse the word "subsidy," both before and since I have been a member of this body, so far as support could be given and was appropriate.

I do not like the term "subsidy." The original meaning of the term "subsidy" was a "bribe." It has taken on a new meaning through use. No shipping bill that has been enacted into a law has ever been a subsidy bill. It has provided, as this bill provides, that the Government shall discriminate in the making of contracts for the performance of services for the Government in such manner as will inure to the benefit of the Government. The present shipping law, enacted on March 3, 1891, is not a subsidy bill. The term "subsidy" was applied to this class of legislation by its opponents in order to make the legislation obnoxious. We have, unfortunately, dropped into the habit of accepting the designation of "subsidy" as applying to this class of legislation, and it has not been to our profit that we have done so.

The bill is a shipping bill. It provides for the making of contracts by the Government of the United States for carrying the mails of the United States and for performing services that the Government must pay for. The real province of the legislation, or the function which it performs, is the distribution of that patronage by the Government so that it shall result in building up ships that may be at the service of the Government when it requires them.

You can not very well send out a discussion of this amendment to the country without coupling with it the legislation to which this amendment is to apply. Under the existing law, the act of 1891, the executive branch of the Government is authorized to make contracts for the carrying of the mails of the United States with certain other countries, between certain ports. It is provided in that law that the mails shall be carried and the contracts made only with vessels that are built in the United States, built by American labor, out of American raw material, manned by American officers, citizens of the United States, and with a percentage prescribed by the law of American citizens as the crew of the vessel. That is what its opponents are pleased to term "a subsidy bill."

It provides also for the education upon each of these vessels of American youth, in order that they may be competent sailors and effective and useful men in the time of the country's need. There is no element of subsidy about that provision. It provides that these vessels shall be constructed under the supervision and control of the Government of the United States, according to certain plans, specifications, and limitations, in order that they may be effective for the service of the United States in case they are needed either as fighting vessels or as auxiliary ships for the support of fighting vessels.

It provides in section 9 that these vessels may be taken and used by the United States as transports or cruisers upon payment to the owners of the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking, and that, in case of disagreement, certain proceedings shall be had for the purpose of determining the value at which these vessels shall be taken.

Is there any element of subsidy or is there any element of unfairness in this providing that the Government shall supervise the construction of these vessels in order to insure their efficiency if they become necessary for the uses of the Government? Is there anything unreasonable in providing that the Government should be allowed to take those vessels in the hour of its need, as I say, either as fighting vessels or as auxiliary vessels to the fighting vessels? It seems to me that to apply the term "subsidy" to a transaction of that kind is a gross misuse of the term; and we have only to look to the opposition for the motive which impels them to term this "a subsidy bill."

I have met with more opposition to this class of legislation in discussing it, as I have discussed it in many parts of this country for the last twenty-five years, because of the use of that word "subsidy" than from any other cause. It was not sufficient that when I asked them what they meant by "subsidy" they were unable to tell me. They understood that it was a term of opprobrium, and that that was sufficient in itself, if applied to anything, to condemn it.

The interior States are just as largely interested in the shipping bill as are the coast States. Aside from the advantage, which is local and limited personally to those who build vessels and who either make or do not make a profit because of such construction, we are interested in the use of these vessels in time of peace, because when they are not engaged in the service of the Government of the United States they are selling us charters for the removal of our grain to foreign countries.

The section of the United States that it is my pleasure and honor to represent in part here ships a larger percentage of its grain to foreign countries than does any other section of the United States. We have a larger percentage of surplus than does any other section of the United States. We produce up in that corner of the country one-tenth of the wheat products of the United States. We sell a larger percentage of that one-tenth than does any other section, and it goes abroad. The greatest percentage of the export of wheat is from that section of the country. The price of charters, which is the measure of transportation, depends upon the available bottoms in which to ship our products, and it varies accordingly as we have the vessels or have them not. Any legislation, any condition that will promote and encourage the building of ships is for our benefit, because the more ships we have available the less will the price of freight or charters be.

We are sending our wheat abroad in foreign bottoms now to a very large percentage, but make it profitable to men to build ships—and I accept the challenge of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT]—make it profitable to men to build ships and the people will benefit by the use of the ships. I care not if it is profitable to build ships; I hope it always will be; but it is profitable not only to the man who has the contract to build the ship, but it is profitable to every department of productive industry which enters into the construction of that ship. It can make the shipbuilding centers profitable by building them up and it can make the commodity-producing section of the country profitable by having them available for their use. Now, that is to demonstrate the fact that in time of peace we are interested in the shipping bill, even though we live in the interior of the country, whether it be in Nebraska or whether it be in Kansas or Idaho, or wherever they raise commodities in excess of their necessities at home which they desire to send abroad. That is from the selfish standpoint. We are all interested in the prosperity of any part of the United States, even though in that particular line and at that particular time we are not benefited. Patriotism dictates that we should not always look at these things from a selfish standpoint; but even from a selfish standpoint we are interested in this class of legislation.

In time of war, as the result of this class of liberal legislation, there should be enough vessels available so that we would not be compelled to hire or buy a single vessel in order to serve our Navy, not only to serve it as auxiliaries, but to serve it by adding to it, as we did in the case of our most recent war, where we impressed our great vessels that had been in the civil service, and as we did in the case of the civil war where we pressed into service even the ferryboats from the North River and took them down and made gunboats and fighting machines of them on the waters of the South.

This bill only provides for the transferring of vessels of class 2 to class 1, so far as compensation is concerned between a certain class of ports within a certain distance prescribed in the amendment. It gives vessels of 16-knot speed the same compensation per mile as is provided under the existing law to be paid to vessels of 20-knot speed. The committee which has reported this bill has investigated this matter, and, as appears by their report, the waters upon which these vessels are to ply and the distances that are limited by the provisions of this amendment are such that it is desirable that this slower class of vessels and of lesser tonnage should be made available and profitable and their building and maintenance encouraged, in order that we may build up on the Pacific coast particularly the class of vessels enumerated in this bill that are plying to the Philippines, to Japan, to China, and to Australasia. Those vessels will be very largely constructed on the Pacific coast. While they are not 20-knot vessels, yet they will perform as effective service as is required to be performed between those points in carrying the mail and in serving the Government of the United States, not by a reckless payment of a generous sum, but by competition through the medium of bids pursuant to advertised proposals of the Government, and they will receive their compensation because they are the lowest bidders.

The price of $4 per ton per mile, which is the maximum allowed under this amendment for these vessels of the second class, is as reasonable as the maximum of $4 a mile, which is now allowed to vessels of the first class, when we take into consideration the limited scope of the application, geographically, of this amendment. When I vote for it I vote for it just as I would vote for any shipping bill that will build up the merchant marine to the limit of the necessities of our people in time of peace and in time of war.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia to submit an amendment.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. BACON] has been called away from the city to attend the funeral of the late distinguished Senator from Maryland, Mr. Whyte. Previous to the time he left he sent to the desk, and I believe had read, an amendment. I have been requested, in his absence, to offer the amendment as his amendment, and I ask its adoption. I send the amendment to the Secretary's desk and ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] presents on behalf of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] a proposed amendment, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

If no contract is made under the provisions of this act for a line of ships between a port on the Atlantic coast south of Cape Charles and South American ports, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General to require that at least one of the lines of ships between ports north of Cape Charles and South American ports shall, upon each outward and homeward voyage, touch at two ports on the Atlantic coast south of Cape Charles, regard being had in the selection of such ports to geographical location and to the volume of the export and import business of the ports so selected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been stated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for that amendment, which I think will be acceptable to Senators who have been in favor of the amendment which has just been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire proposes a substitute for the amendment which has just been read, which will now be stated by the Secretary for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That if no contract is made under the provisions of this act for a line of ships between a port on the Atlantic coast south of Cape Charles and South American ports, the Postmaster-General shall, provided two or more lines are established from North Atlantic ports, require that one of said lines shall, upon each outward and homeward voyage, touch at at least two ports on the Atlantic coast south of Cape Charles, regard being had in the selection of such ports of call to geographical location and to the volume of the export and import business of the ports so selected.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I do not know the views of my colleague [Mr. BACON] in regard to the proposed substitute. I do not know whether he would be satisfied with it or not. I have not heard him express himself about it, and I presume the amendment has been prepared since he left the city.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator, Mr. President, that the proposed substitute substantially covers the provisions of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, except that under the amendment submitted by him if only one line should be established on the North Atlantic, it would be required to touch at these Southern ports, while the substitute provides that, if two or more lines should be established, one of those lines should so touch. I feel sure that, if the Senator from Georgia were present, he would agree to the substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just adopted it is proposed to add the following:

Provided further, That the total expenditure for foreign mail service in any one year shall not exceed the estimated revenue therefrom for that year.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no objection to that amendment, and I hope it will be agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has been called away from Washington and has asked me to present for him an amendment, to which I think there will be no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine, on behalf of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 11, after the word "act," it is proposed to insert:

And vessels of the third class on said routes at a rate per mile not exceeding the rate applicable to vessels of the second class as provided in said act.

Mr. GALLINGER. That amendment will precede the amendments that have just been agreed to, Mr. President. There is no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], which has already been read.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk, and I desire to make a short statement in regard to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That the interstate-commerce character of all shipments of intoxicating liquors, including ale, wine, and beer, from one State or Territory into another State or Territory, shall terminate immediately upon their arrival within the boundary of the State or Territory in which the place of destination is situated, and before the delivery of said liquors to the consignee; and said liquors and all corporations and persons engaged in such shipment shall then become subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise: Provided, That shipments of such liquors entirely through a State or Territory, and not intended for delivery therein, shall not be subject to the provisions of this act, nor shall this act authorize the infringement of the right of common carriers to continue to transport such merchandise from without such State to a station therein. That in all such shipments to be paid for on delivery, commonly called "C. O. D." shipments, the sale shall be held to be made at the place of destination, or where the money is paid or the goods delivered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I want to state to the Senator from Georgia that I shall very cordially cooperate with him to secure the desired legislation he has in view, and I am informed that a report will speedily be made from the committee having this matter in charge, so that we shall have an opportunity in the near future to vote on it. I hope the Senator will not press the amendment.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I will consume but a minute of the time of the Senate. I have never done so in a useless way.

I believe this to be very important legislation. Whether it is constitutional legislation, I concede is not a settled question. The Wilson Act provided that, when whisky or liquors were shipped into a State, on arrival the State should have jurisdiction to regulate and control it. In construing the act of Congress, the Supreme Court held that the words "arrival in a State" meant after delivery to the consignee. The court, in passing upon the question, said that Congress simply provided that on arriving within a State the State should have jurisdiction to regulate and control it, but did not say "before delivery to the consignee;" and if Congress had intended to say "before delivery to the consignee," Congress would have so said. All that this amendment proposes is simply to give the States that have voted for prohibition jurisdiction to regulate the shipment of liquor into their borders and control it after it is delivered by the express company to the agent and before delivery to the consignee.

Mr. President, the Senate has been tardy to some extent in regard to this legislation. I will say at first I had some fear in regard to this legislation being in order, but I want to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill and the attention of the Senate to the third clause of Rule XVI, which reads as follows:

3. No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto.

In my judgment that clearly means an appropriation bill. I do not think there is any doubt that under the rules of this Senate you can offer to a bill other than an appropriation bill another bill upon an entirely different subject. In fact, my attention has been called to a private pension bill, increasing a pension from ten to twelve dollars a month, on which was ingrafted a bill relating to the public lands containing fourteen sections. I have also before me eight appropriation bills which were submitted to the Senate containing legislation of a general nature and general character. I have found half a dozen instances where a bill entirely different from the bill that was pending has been enacted into law as an amendment. I am clear in my mind, therefore, that that rule would not apply.

Just a word more. As the Senator from New Hampshire has said, I have been assured that the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee has had this question under consideration for several weeks. I understand a minority report has been filed in favor of this measure and a majority report against it. I am also informed that the Committee on the Judiciary will meet on Monday next, when it will take up this question, decide it, and present it to the Senate either favorably or adversely.

Mr. President, what I want is the direct question brought before the Senate. If a bill on this subject is reported to the Senate adversely, it goes to the Calendar, and we can disagree to that report if a majority of the Senate shall be favorable to that course. It would be manifestly unjust to the people of the United States, or to the people of those States that have adopted prohibition, to prevent this question coming before the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to say to the Senator from Georgia that the Judiciary Committee has been actively engaged upon this very question. Half a dozen different bills from half a dozen different sources—one, I believe, introduced by the Senator himself, one by his colleague [Mr. BACON], and three or four or five others—have been pending before that committee for something like six weeks. During all of my service on that committee, which now covers a period of some ten or twelve years, I have never known a question to be taken up so promptly, and so thoroughly, conscientiously, and energetically gone into as has been done by the subcommittee of which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is the chairman.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. One moment. The desire has been to bring that matter speedily before this House, and it will be done in the very near future. I am not prepared to say that it will be on Monday next. It is not a question that can be disposed of in one day, but there are now in print—and I think such a thing has never been heretofore done in the history of legislation, before that committee at least—the individual views of every single member of the subcommittee for presentation to the general committee.

I hope the Senator will not try to give the impression that the Judiciary Committee has been derelict in its duty or that it seeks to evade the responsibility which attaches to any committee to bring legislation promptly before the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. I have not tried to create that impression, but frankness compels me to say to the Senator from Wyoming that in 1903 a similar bill to the amendment which I have offered to this measure passed the House of Representatives practically without any opposition. That bill, commonly called the Hepburn-Dolliver bill, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and it has slept there for a period of nearly six years. In 1906 a bill similar in character to the amendment we are now considering was referred to the Judiciary Committee. It has been there ever since.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Would he like the Judiciary Committee of the Sixtieth Congress to take action and report on a bill introduced and referred to the committee in 1906? My attention was attracted by what the Senator said about a bill which was not introduced in the present Congress, and is not before the Committee on the Judiciary of this Congress.

Mr. CLAY. I did not catch what the Senator said. Somebody was talking near me.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator cited the fact that a bill had been referred to the Judiciary Committee in 1906.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I think the impression which the Senate has from the remarks of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee is that the committee will not be precipitate in its action on this matter.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The committee will be as prompt as the proper consideration of the question requires and will allow.

Mr. CLAY. That is all I ask. It is all I seek. State after State has voted in favor of prohibition, and if Congress is empowered to give the States the right to exercise the police powers to control the whisky after it arrives in those States, it is the duty of the Congress to do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Georgia made a statement about the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I did not understand what it was.

Mr. CLAY. I said that the Hepburn-Dolliver bill, according to my recollection, went to the Interstate Commerce Committee in 1903.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator does not suppose that that bill is still before the committee, I take it?

Mr. CLAY. I do not. I understand the rules of the House and of the Senate, also, although I have not been here so long as the Senator from Rhode Island, and may never be. It shows that the American people have been knocking at the doors of Congress for six or seven years for this class of legislation. I maintain that when my State votes in favor of prohibition, when Maine votes in favor of prohibition, when Iowa, Indiana, or any other State in the Union does so, and the people of those States reach the conclusion that they want to prohibit the shipment of liquor into those States, so far as we can protect them it is our duty to do so.

I believe the time is coming when the barroom will be closed in the United States. I am not prepared to say we will have absolute prohibition. I am here simply to carry out the wishes and the instructions of the legislature of my State and to ask Congress to give us the police power which we want to exercise in controlling the shipment of liquors after they arrive in the State and before delivery to the consignee.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, this is a very important legal question. For myself, I do not believe Congress can increase the police power of the State any more than I believe it can take away from it, and but for a decision of the Supreme Court I should say that it was doubtful whether this legislation could be enacted properly. But there is a decision of the court which I think indicates that the court might support this kind of legislation. I am very much in favor of it if it is a sound legal proposition.

I understand when the Judiciary Committee reports we shall get some ideas of what at least the members of that committee think the law is. So far as my inclination goes, it is to support this proposition of the Senator from Georgia, and I believe there is a decision of the court which would indicate that we have the power so to do, although, if I should express my opinion about the proposed law, I should think it was very doubtful.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I am very much in earnest about this legislation, because the immediate people whom I have the honor in part to represent are anxious to see it passed. I believe it to be right. I believe it to be proper. You never will know whether or not it can be done constitutionally until the question is passed upon by our Supreme Court. I am not here to appeal to passion and prejudice. I have never done it on the floor of the Senate at any time. I concede that you never will know what the law on this question is until the direct question shall go to our Supreme Court. But when the people, some of the best people in the Republic, are clamoring for this legislation—and the court has intimated that Congress did not do it, but if Congress had desired to say so, Congress would have said so—I say, then, that the direct question ought to be put to the Supreme Court and let them pass upon it. We may sit here for a dozen years, and we may not legislate, and we will never know what can be done. Many great questions have been involved in doubt. Even the constitutionality of the legal tender of greenbacks was involved in doubt, and it was decided both ways by the court.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator from Georgia says that the Supreme Court in one decision has intimated——

Mr. CLAY. I probably went too far.

Mr. FULTON. I was going to ask the Senator to what decision he referred.

Mr. CLAY. I refer to the Iowa case.

Mr. FULTON. I am a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I have been looking up that question very thoroughly——

Mr. CLAY. I have a brief on it.

Mr. FULTON (continuing). Very earnestly desiring to discover something said by the Supreme Court that would sustain such an enactment.

Mr. CLAY. Here is what the Supreme Court held——

Mr. FULTON. Before the Senator answers, I wish to say a word.

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I simply want to call the Senator's attention to a fact in connection with his statement that Congress should enable the State to close the saloons. Congress has already removed the impediment that existed under the interstate commerce clause as construed by the Supreme Court to the execution of laws of the States against the sale of liquor. There was a time when it was held, in fact, so far as that is concerned, in the absence of Congressional legislation it is the law to-day, that liquor could not be prohibited from sale by the States when sold in the original packages. Congress removed that impediment.

Now, then, when the Senator proposes that Congress shall go further back and give to the States the power to arrest the liquor while it is in interstate transportation and actual transit, I suggest to the Senator, unless he has investigated the question very carefully, he will find it is beset with far more difficulties than the original-package proposition.

Mr. CLAY. I have investigated it, and I contend that when liquors are shipped from a wet into a dry State, and arrive by express and are delivered to the agent, and are no longer in transportation, the States can be given jurisdiction to control it.

Mr. FULTON. When delivered.

Mr. CLAY. That is the question.

Mr. FULTON. Let me call his attention to the fact that the Senator's proposition is immediately on arrival and before delivery. That is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. CLAY. The Wilson law, to which you refer, provided on arrival within the State, the State should have jurisdiction, and the Supreme Court construed on "arrival" meant after delivery to the consignee; and all that this amendment proposes to do is simply to provide before delivery to the consignee. When the liquor is in transportation it presents one question. But after it is delivered to the depot agent, and no longer in transportation, another question is presented. But I do not want, at this late hour in the evening, to discuss the legal phases of this case. I have here a brief of eight or ten authorities. I could consume a couple of hours in doing so.

Mr. President, the Senator in charge of this bill is a friend of this legislation. He has introduced a bill exactly on the same line, and is pressing it. If I can do it, I intend that there shall be a vote on this proposed legislation at an early day. I had much rather see this legislation come in the regular way from a committee, either favorably or adversely reported, and of course preferably favorably. I know, whether it be favorably or adversely reported, if it goes on the Calendar we can secure a vote. If a majority of the Senate is against this legislation, I am willing to bow, for it is my duty to do so. But I do not believe we should arrest a great moral movement for the improvement of the human race without due and careful consideration.

Now, inasmuch as I have been informed that the subcommittee has filed its report in writing, two in favor of the constitutionality of the proposed law and three against it, inasmuch as I am informed that these reports are now being printed—and if I am not correctly informed I shall be glad to know it——

Mr. FULTON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CLAY. And that these reports will be in print and before the Judiciary Committee next Monday——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Judiciary Committee, through its chairman, here and now declines to say what business will come before the committee on next Monday. I can simply say to the Senator, as I assured him before, that this bill and kindred bills are receiving particular consideration by that committee, and it will report as rapidly as it can consistent with due deliberation.

The Senator has informed us that he has prepared a brief upon the legal phases of the proposition. I will say that the Judiciary Committee extends to him now, as it did three or four weeks ago, and as it did to other members of this body, an invitation to give that committee all the light they can upon this very important question.

Mr. CLAY. I have been informed, I will say to the Senator, the chairman of the committee, that the subcommittee has been hearing the constitutional question discussed probably for six weeks or two months. I have been informed that it has been an able discussion on both sides. I have been informed by a member of the subcommittee of the reports which have been filed and which are in writing, and that they were pressing in every way they could.

I would press this amendment this evening, but I have been asked not to do it for the reason that Senators say they want to see the written reports made by the subcommittee, and for the further reason that they want a week or ten days' notice when the question is going to be discussed. The Senator from New Hampshire is a friend of this measure, and he has especially asked me not to press it at this time and on this bill. I intend, at the proper time, to offer it to other legislation, either local or general bills, and to ask a vote on it, and in doing so I believe I shall simply carry out the instructions of the legislature of my State and the wishes of the people of my State. I am through, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY].

Mr. CLAY. I will not press the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia withdraws the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 20, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENT.

The Speaker announced the assignment of Mr. ROTHERMEL to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

BUREAU OF CORPORATIONS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report.

House resolution 302.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the House all such information and data in reference to the organization, conduct, and management of all corporations, joint stock companies, or corporate combinations engaged in commerce among the several States and with foreign nations as may have been reported to the President by the Commissioner of Corporations, Department of Commerce and Labor, under the provisions of the act of February 14, 1903, creating the Department of Commerce and Labor, that has not yet been made public by the President.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to report the resolution back with a recommendation that it lie on the table; but I withhold the motion for the present and yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, the resolution reported by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with the recommendation that it lie on the table is an important resolution. I think it due to the House and to the country that an explanation be made——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents a privileged report from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and gives notice that in pursuance of instructions of that committee he will move to lay the same upon the table, but withholds the motion temporarily, and yields twenty minutes of time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, under the act of February 14, 1903, creating the Department of Commerce and Labor, some of the most remarkable provisions of law are to be found that can be found anywhere in our statute books. They are absolutely without precedent and without parallel, and I hope will never be repeated in any other law. Now, that act provides among other things for the creation of the Bureau of Corporations, and it provides:

That the Commissioner of the Bureau of Corporations, under the direction and control of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall make diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the business of any corporation, joint stock company, or corporate organization engaged in commerce among the several States and foreign nations, except common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and to gather such information and data as will enable the President of the United States to make recommendations to Congress for legislation for the regulation of such commerce and to report said data to the President from time to time as he shall require, and that the information so obtained or as much thereof as the President shall direct shall be made public.

Well, now, in order to accomplish the purpose of this part of the section the most comprehensive and liberal power is conferred upon the Bureau of Corporations. It is given all the power over this class of corporations that is conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission over corporations that come within its jurisdiction. It is given the power to compel the production of books and papers, the attendance and giving of testimony by witnesses. It has every power that will enable it to go to the bottom of the operations of all corporations engaged in interstate commerce.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the act to which I refer, creating this Bureau, also has at the end of the section to which I have just alluded the following general provision of law:

It shall also be the province and duty of said Bureau, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to gather, compile, publish, and supply useful information concerning corporations doing business within the limits of the United States as shall engage in interstate commerce or in commerce between the United States and any foreign country, including corporations engaged in insurance, and to attend to such other duties as may be hereafter provided by law.

You notice that that provision that is made for information for the benefit of the public is in the most general, vague, and indefinite terms. It is merely described as "useful information."

When the authority was conferred on this Bureau to gather information and data, described with minute particularity, for the use of the President, ample power in every respect and every opportunity were conferred on the Bureau to enable it to carry out that power and to enable it to exercise that authority. But when, at the conclusion of the paragraph, provision was made for information for the use of the public it was not only indefinitely and vaguely described, but absolutely no power was conferred upon the Bureau in order to execute that power, and no machinery was provided for that purpose.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just exactly what we might have expected to happen under remarkable provisions of law like these has happened. The Bureau of Corporations has been in existence for five years. It has already spent, in round numbers, a million dollars of the public money, more than $600,000 of which we have appropriated for the express purpose of gathering this information. Now, what has happened? How much of it has been made public? A monograph on the beef trust, a report on the rebates of the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company given to the Standard Oil Company, and a petroleum report, issued not very long ago by direction, as I understand it, of the President of the United States. Nothing else has been made public, although $600,000 of the public money has been spent to gather this information. And when Members of Congress have appealed to this Bureau for information, so that they might have the opportunity of trying to understand how to frame legislation on these subjects, they have been met with the statement that the information that the Bureau has collected was not collected for the use of Congress, was not collected for the information of the public, but was collected for the sole and exclusive purpose of enabling the President of the United States to recommend legislation to Congress. I had some correspondence during the present Congress with the Commissioner of Corporations on this very subject. I asked him for certain information about certain classes of corporations that fell under the jurisdiction of his Bureau under the law to which I have referred. I wish to submit that correspondence to the House and to the country. It is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1908.

The COMMISSIONER OF CORPORATIONS,
Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The act creating the Department of Commerce and Labor (act of Feb. 14, 1903) provides:

"It shall also be the duty and province of said Bureau (referring to the Bureau of Corporations), under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to gather, compile, publish, and supply useful information concerning such corporations doing business within the limits of the United States as shall engage in interstate commerce," etc.

I want to inquire whether your Bureau, acting under the above provisions of law, or under any other provision of law, has "gathered, compiled, and published," or can "supply" the following "useful information concerning corporations doing business within the limits of the United States and engaged in interstate commerce?"

(1) The capital stock and bonds authorized and actually issued, with the amount of dividends and interest actually paid on the same, of all such corporations as produce or control as much as 50 per cent of the total production in the United States of any article of commerce.

(2) The actual value of the property of such corporations as are described above.

(3) The average prices charged for the products produced by such corporations for each year, beginning with and including the year 1896, and up to and including 1907.

(4) The average price charged for similar products in the principal foreign countries for each year from 1896 to 1907, inclusive.

(5) The total value of the products of all such corporations, with the percentage that the same constitutes of the total value of similar products in the United States.

(6) Any information as to corporations doing business in this country and engaged in interstate commerce of the character suggested in the five preceding paragraphs, whether such corporations produce or control more or less than 50 per cent of the product of similar articles in the United States.

(7) Any information whatever about "industrial combinations" along the same or similar lines as those pursued by the Census Bureau in its bulletin of December 30, 1901 (Bull. No. 122), entitled "Industrial Combinations."

In your reply hereto please state affirmatively or negatively whether you can "supply information" of the character described in each of the seven paragraphs, separately, and if you can supply the information called for in each or any of them, please refer me to the report, if one has been published.

Hoping that I may have an early reply, and thanking you in advance for your courtesy, I am,

Very respectfully,

THOS. W. HARDWICK.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
BUREAU OF CORPORATIONS,
Washington, February 25, 1908.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your letter of the 24th instant was received, desiring to know whether this Bureau has published certain information. I think the best way of answering your question is to state exactly what the Bureau has published in that line, which is as follows:

"Reply to the Allegations of the Standard Oil Company, which deals with the statements made by that company in relation to the so-called 'Alton rebate case.'

"Annual Reports for 1904, 1905, 1906, and 1907.

"Report on the Petroleum Industry, Part I, being the 'Position of the Standard Oil Company in the Industry.'

"Report on the Transportation of Petroleum, being the report which set forth the railway discriminations and concessions enjoyed by the Standard Oil Company over large sections of the country, upon which substantially all the prosecutions of that company have since been based.

"Report on the Petroleum Industry, Part II, being 'Prices and Profits.'"

The names of all Congressmen are on our mailing list, and copies of all reports as they come out have been sent to every Congressman holding office at that time, so that I think that you should have received copies of all these reports. I mention this distribution to Congressmen because the editions of these reports are limited by law to a very small number, to wit, 2,500, and most of them have been nearly exhausted. The edition of the last-mentioned report, Part II of the Report on the Petroleum Industry, is completely exhausted, except what I need for office use.

If, however, any of these reports strike you as what you desire and you do not find such reports in your files and will let me know, I will be glad to send you copies so far as I may have them for distribution.

Very respectfully,

HERBERT KNOX SMITH,
Commissioner.

Hon. THOMAS W. HARDWICK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 27, 1907.

The COMMISSIONER OF CORPORATIONS,
Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have your letter of 25th instant in reply to mine of 24th instant. If I understand your letter, you advise me that your Bureau has not "gathered, compiled, and published," and can not now "supply" any information of the character described in my letter of 24th instant, except the reports with reference to the petroleum industry, to which you make reference. Please advise me plainly whether I am correct about that or not.

I suppose I have received your annual reports, but I can not now lay my hands upon them, so I will be greatly obliged to you if you will send me copies of your annual reports for 1904, 1905, 1906, and 1907.

Awaiting your reply, and thanking you for your courtesy, I am,

Very, respectfully,

THOS. W. HARDWICK.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
BUREAU OF CORPORATIONS,
Washington, March 2, 1908.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Replying to your letter of the 27th ultimo, let me say that you are correct in understanding that this Bureau has not "published" any information of the character described in your letter of the 24th ultimo, except the reports which I named in my letter of the 25th ultimo, which, if you will notice, covered not only the petroleum, but also the beef industry.

It would not be correct to say, however, that this Bureau has not "gathered or compiled" any other information, for it has on hand now investigations of a number of subjects—steel industry, lumber, cotton exchanges, International Harvester Company, tobacco industry, waterways, and one or two others, in all of which lines it has gathered a large amount of information. This information, however, is strictly confidential under the terms of the act which created the Bureau, by virtue of which I am allowed only to report this information to the President, who can then make public so much thereof as he chooses. So that the information of the Bureau is available generally only in the shape of its regular reports.

As you request, I am sending you, under separate cover, copies of my annual reports for 1904, 1905, 1906, and 1907.

Very respectfully,

HERBERT KNOX SMITH,
Commissioner.

Hon. THOMAS W. HARDWICK,

Now, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House, what sort of a situation have we here under this remarkable law to which I have referred? We have Congress in the attitude of spending the people's money for information which it trusts to the President of the United States, and to him alone; which it will neither give to the public nor trust itself with, and it appears from this correspondence that the President has not trusted the public with all of it. He has issued a monograph on the beef trust, a report on the petroleum industry, and nothing besides that except the report in the Chicago and Alton rebate case. In the last five years we have spent a million dollars in support of this Bureau; $600,000 for the express and direct purpose of gathering this information, and yet there is no Member of Congress on either side, not even the Speaker himself, who would have the right, if the law is administered, to go there and find out what the facts are about any given line of industry, about any class of corporations engaged in interstate commerce, so that he would know, if he desired to know, how to frame legislation that met his views, whether it met the views of the President or not, on this important subject.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the President in one of his messages a few years ago recommended publicity as the best means of suppressing the trusts, and the only means that could suppress them?

Mr. HARDWICK. He did, and I want to say that this Bureau, in more than one of its annual reports, has said that general publicity was the remedy for these evils, the best remedy, the most beneficent and the most efficient remedy, and yet, under this law and under the operations of the Bureau of Corporations and of the President, we do not have the very publicity that the Bureau recommends and that the President so often extols.

And yet under the law and under the practice of the President, and under the practice of these Departments, and under the practice of this Bureau, the country has not, never has had, and, unless we take some action, never will have general publicity about this law. In what a ridiculous attitude this House and this Congress places itself! It deliberately says that we will by law spend the money of the people, the public money, for information to enable the President to tell us how to legislate about these trusts and industrial combinations, and we will fix the law so that we ourselves can not go there and find out exactly what has been discovered by that Bureau.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. I did not quite catch the reading or the address of the letter which the gentleman read a few moments ago. Did it begin by "My dear Congressman" or "My dear Harriman?" [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. "My dear Congressman." There is no Harriman in this, at least.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not possible that general publicity and general prosperity decamped at the same time? [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does not the gentleman concede that the Republican party in the last campaign derived very great benefit from the Bureau of Corporations, in that it is reported in the papers that Mr. Harriman gave up $250,000 of railroad money, and old Perkins gave up $50,000 belonging to the policy holders of the insurance companies, as a Republican campaign fund?

Mr. HARDWICK. I believe that has not been denied. Now I can not yield any further, because my time is limited.

What a ridiculous attitude Congress puts itself in before the people! We are not willing to trust ourselves with this information; the President must exercise his wise discretion about saying how much shall be published, how much shall not be published, although it was all paid for out of the Public Treasury, and we are all entitled to know it.

Mr. Speaker, what else can you expect from laws of this kind except Executive legislation? Here is the ammunition chest from which the President gets his shot and shell with which to load his 16-inch guns, but he gives it out to Congress and the people by driblets, to suit his own purpose and his own convenience and his own views and the expediency of his own party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No wonder, Mr. Speaker, that this House and Congress is called a "do-nothing House" and a "do-nothing Congress." We can not move until we get information from the White House, and if the White House does not choose to give us information we do not move at all. So that the report goes out all over this land to the people in all sections of the country and of all parties that while we have a strenuous President we have a do-nothing Congress, and he only gets what he forces out of us by a liberal use of the big stick.

No wonder they say, Mr. Speaker, that important legislation is no longer originated on Capitol Hill, but is originated and framed at the other end of the avenue, in the White House. Conference after conference is held there with people who are not members of this body and who are not elected representatives of the people—people who are summoned there by the President of the United States to advise and confer with him about these matters.

I hold in my hand an article from the Washington Post, dated March 13, 1908, and we see here where the President has had a conference on the subject of amending the Sherman antitrust law. They say that the representatives of the Administration were the President, Secretary of State Root, Attorney-General Bonaparte, Secretary of the Interior Garfield, and Commissioner of Corporations Smith. Of course they could not get along without the Commissioner of Corporations Smith, because he has the ammunition chest. Victor Morawetz, general solicitor of the Santa Fe Railroad, and F. L. Stetson, one of the counsel for J. P. Morgan & Co., New York bankers, were there in the interest of the railroads and industrial and financial combination. President Samuel Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor, was present for organized labor, and former Mayor Seth Low, of New York, represented the Civic Federation.

The result of all this is to be that we are to have, if we believe newspaper reports, legislation originated there; born at the other end of this Avenue, and brought to us by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], chairman of this Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and never originating at all in this House and sent by us there. I say it is ridiculous for us to spend the people's money to gather information for the President alone, Mr. Speaker, when we ought to have it ourselves, at first hand, and not at second hand; when we ought to have it in its entirety, and not by piecemeal or in driblets according to the will or opinion of any one man, whether he be the President of the United States or anybody else. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I say that it is time for the American Congress, for the American House of Representatives, to assert its own manhood, to assert its own rights, and to say to the President in respectful language, "We request you to let us have this information; do not hold any of it back; if there is going to be any classification of trusts into good trusts and bad trusts, let us have something to say about the classification and do not undertake to do it all yourself." I want to see the day return, Mr. Speaker, when it will be no longer necessary to have all legislation in Congress approved and commended before its passage at the other end of the Avenue. I want to see the time return when the House will resume its independence, will resume its rights, and will insist that all information collected at public expense shall be subject at all times to examination, I think, by all the public, and certainly by the representatives of the people. Now, if that is not a sound sentiment, if that is not right, then this resolution ought not to pass; then our friends on the other side of this aisle ought to table it, as they may do after this discussion is over, anyway; but if I am right in these principles I have been asserting, if I am right in these policies for which I have been contending, then it ought not to be tabled by any sort of vote, partisan or otherwise, but we ought to say to the President, "Let us have this information, and all of it."

Mr. Speaker, there are two objections that are made to this resolution to which I desire to make answer as briefly as I can. In the first place, it is suggested by gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber that this resolution will prove a perfect dragnet and will bring in a whole lot of information that would fill a great many large volumes and that will do us no good. I want to say in answer to that objection that if the information was valuable enough to pay $600,000 for it, if the information was valuable enough to put a whole department and bureau at work to collect it, I think we ought at least to look at it and decide for ourselves how much is superfluous and how much is not. Beside that, I want to say to the gentleman who will make this motion to table, that the law requires that the Commissioner of Corporations shall only report to the President such data and information as is necessary in order to enable the President to make recommendations to Congress for legislation. He will not report, he has not reported, he does not report, and he never will report, under this provision of law, unnecessary, superfluous, and useless information to the President, but he gives him the facts upon which he is to base his recommendations for legislation; and I say if we are ever going to have in this Chamber any initiative of our own, any independence of our own, any action of our own, that is not forced from the other end of the Avenue, it is time for us to begin to get a little information on our own hook without waiting for the President to be sending it to us as he pleases and withholding it when he pleases.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to grant me five more minutes.

Mr. MANN. I yield five more minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. One more proposition, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman says, or may say in concluding this debate, that there are certain reasons why all this information ought not to be made public, that business secrets are disclosed or may be disclosed that the general public ought not to know about, that the House itself ought not to know about.

I do not concede the soundness of any such argument as that. If in law and in morals the general public and the House ought not to know, and these secrets are of a character that ought not to be brought out and exposed to the light of day, then I say it is equally true and equally indisputable that the President himself ought not to force its disclosure by law, even for his own use. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways, and the President of the United States is no more entitled to a corner on information—he is no more entitled to exclusive possession of information which is to be used as a basis of legislation—than the House is entitled to such information, and we have no more right to keep information from the public or from the President than he has a right, morally speaking, to keep it from us. I am glad to say, Mr. Speaker, that when this remarkable law, which inaugurated this unique scheme of gathering and dispensing information, was passed by this House that this body was opposed to it, and I am informed by my friend the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] that he protested to the very end, both in this House and on the conference committee, against any such unfair, undemocratic, unrepublican, and un-American system of collecting information that we were not willing for the whole people to have. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, I will read the prediction I made about this very thing that he is discussing:

> I ask most solemnly, if anything is really contemplated by this substitute, why not require the President to turn over his information to his Attorney-General and require him to act at once? The cloven foot shows itself here. I appeal to the honest construction that any man will give to the ordinary English language—what does that mean, "As much thereof as the President may direct shall be made public?" He can suppress all data, every scintilla of information. He can hold it secret and stand pat and say and do nothing, and no law can move him. Is that publicity? Do you propose to put into the hands of one man the autocratic power to pass on the question that involves the great interests and welfare of all the people? What wonderful power do you place in one man's hands! It can be used in a most dangerous manner * * *. I say that this measure, with all due regard for the honesty, ingenuity, and ability of the conferees who framed and ratified it, is entitled to be characterized as a pretext and subterfuge; and if I do not characterize it as that, I will say, at least, that in my humble opinion it is but an echo and expression of the opinion of that great Republican, who has announced the Republican policy relative to all antilegislation to be to "stand pat," do nothing. This substitute comes up to the full measure of that policy.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I applaud the gentleman's position now, as I did then. He was right then, Mr. Speaker. There can not be any doubt about the fact that this resolution ought not to be tabled on the ground that this information is needed for the use of the Department of Justice and that to make it public might embarrass that Department in its prosecution of criminals or in civil suits. Why? Because the legislation says itself that this information shall be reported to the President for the sole and exclusive purpose of enabling him to "recommend the legislation to Congress."

The Department of Justice attends to the collection of evidence, and there is in one of these reports an expression from this Bureau of Corporations to the effect that where the work of the Department of Justice overlaps their work they do not interfere with each other at all. This information is intrusted to the President for the sole purpose of enabling him to "recommend legislation."

Now, gentlemen, in conclusion, I appeal to every gentleman in this House, without regard to party, without regard to partisan feeling or partisan lines, to throw aside both on this occasion and reassert the independence and manhood of the House of Representatives. The President has always been the advocate of "turning on the light." Now let us ask him to turn all the light on, and turn it all on at once. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia is, and I take it is intended to be, a reflection upon the honesty and the motives of the President of the United States. There can be no other excuse for the resolution at all except to have the House reflect upon the President. The President has had no information given to him under the Bureau of Corporations act which he has kept from the public. He has received no information from the Bureau of Corporations which has not been made public. The only purpose of this resolution is to make it appear that the President is endeavoring to conceal information from the House and from the public. The Bureau of Corporations in the course of its existence has acquired a large amount of information which has not been made public. There is on file in the Bureau of Corporations to-day, I am informed by the Commissioner, perhaps a hundred thousand pages of information and data which have been collected in various ways and used for the purpose of making up the reports which have come from that Bureau. It must be remembered that the Bureau of Corporations has carried on a large number of investigations. Reports have already been made on the beef industry; on the transportation of petroleum, covering the rebate system of the Standard Oil Company; another report on the petroleum industry, part 1, being the position of the Standard Oil Company in the petroleum industry; another report on the petroleum industry, part 2, prices and profits in the petroleum industry; another report affecting the allegations of the Standard Oil Company in the matter of the rebate case. There are now being carried on in that Bureau a large number of investigations—further work on the petroleum industry, especially conditions in foreign countries; investigations relating to the iron and steel industry, the lumber industry; operations of the cotton exchanges, and their effect on prices; inland waterways and coastwise water carriers; investigations on patents held by Government employees on articles used by the Government, and also in regard to the International Harvester Company. These investigations are at different stages of completion and are going on contemporaneously. Does the gentleman desire the information collected by these investigations to be sent to the House before the investigations are completed? Is that what the gentleman is after? These reports have not yet been made to the President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I did not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want the investigations which have not yet been completed, or is he complaining that the investigations that have been completed have not been made public? Does the gentleman assert that any reports made to the President on the beef industry or in regard to the petroleum industry by the Bureau of Corporations have not been made public by the President? If he does, then I deny it. The President has acted with the utmost good faith with Congress. He has given the information to the people, such as he has received. It is undoubtedly true that when the Bureau of Corporations was created and given the broad powers which it was given—powers beyond, so far as their enforcement is concerned, the powers of the Government; when it was given those powers it was with the understanding that there might often be a desire to obtain information, in order to make up reports giving general results, which might not and should not be given out to the public. There are many people and corporations in the country who would not be willing to make public their trade secrets, but which give to the Bureau of Corporations those trade secrets with the understanding that the specific information shall not be made public, but only used in making up the reports of general results. The same is true of the Bureau of the Census. The same system is followed by the Bureau of the Census. That was the policy of the Government and of Congress when it enacted the law creating the Bureau of Corporations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I do not care to yield. Yesterday the gentleman from New York complained and criticised because the President acted without a law of Congress. To-day the gentleman from Georgia complains and criticises because the President acts according to the law of Congress. If the gentleman does not like the law providing for the Bureau of Corporations, let him introduce a bill, which he has not done, to change the law creating the Bureau of Corporations.

I believe it is a right law, and I claim the credit for having originated the idea of the Bureau of Corporations and putting that provision into the law creating the Department of Commerce and Labor. In its present form it was agreed to in conference and became the law. It has resulted in immeasurable good to the country. These investigations which have been carried on by the Bureau of Corporations under this law have done more good in giving to Congress the control and the effort to control the great corporations of the country and the great combinations of the country than all the laws ever written upon the statute books before that time. This law has resulted in the conviction of more people for violation of the antirebate law and the conviction for violations of the so-called "antitrust laws" than all of the other laws ever put upon the statute books. That law has resulted in so much good that all of the charges made on the left side of this aisle are unworthy when they attribute any base motives to the President. He has been the leader of this reform. He has been the man whom we have been proud to follow on both sides of the aisle in the effort to make governmental control supreme over these interstate organizations and corporations. I do not propose, if I can help it, in this House to cast any reflection upon his motives or his actions, as this resolution would do. I therefore move to lay the resolution upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves that the resolution do lie upon the table.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman to yield me five minutes on this very question.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SULZER. Then I ask unanimous consent to speak on this resolution for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. HARDWICK. On the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 151, nays 115, voting "present" 6, not voting 116, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan, at his discretion, to the executive committee of the lodge of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks at Dallas, Tex., having in charge the arrangements for the national convention of Elks to be held in Dallas, Tex., in July, 1908, 2,500 tents, with poles, ridges, and pins for each: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of such property, the same to be delivered to said committee designated at such time prior to the date of said convention as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and William H. Atwell, chairman of said executive committee: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, before delivering such property, take from said William H. Atwell a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, and the whole without expense to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BEALL of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

APPEALS IN NATURALIZATION CASES.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16652) to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States."

Be it enacted, etc., That section 11 of an act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States, approved June 29, 1906, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following:

"At any time within sixty days from the date of the entry of a final order in a naturalization case, either the applicant for admission to citizenship or the United States may take an appeal from such order on questions of law only to the United States circuit court of appeals for the circuit in which such order is entered. The judgments, orders, or decrees of the circuit courts of appeals in such cases shall be final in the same manner and to the same extent as is now provided by section 6 of the act of March 3, 1891, establishing circuit courts of appeals."

The amendment recommended by the committee was read as follows:

Insert in line 12 of page 1, between the word "appeal" and the word "on," the words "from such order."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, is this for the purpose of permitting either the applicant or the Government to take an appeal?

Mr. HAYES. That is the purpose, on questions of law.

Mr. MANN. I understand from the report it was in order to have a uniform construction of the law within circuits. Is there any method of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. HAYES. None except the same as in other cases. The intention of this bill is to put all cases of naturalization upon exactly the same basis with other cases, giving the right of appeal to the circuit court of appeals where the right would exist in other cases only.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. What does the gentleman mean by "other cases"—all controversies in court?

Mr. HAYES. I will yield to the gentleman from New York to answer that.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The circuit court act of 1891 permits an appeal to the Supreme Court where the circuit court of appeals thinks the question ought to be passed upon.

Mr. MANN. That is to certify the question of law?

Mr. BENNET of New York. That is it.

Mr. MANN. What would be the effect upon a case of this kind? A man applies for citizenship, and the Government prays an appeal. It would be rather hard on some poor fellow who wants to be a citizen when, after the court has passed on it in his favor, the Government may take the question up on appeal.

Mr. HAYES. I can explain it in a few words. This is a new law, and the Bureau of Naturalization has found, in the practical operation of the law, that in some sections of the country it is administered in one way and in some in another way, and they desire this legislation in order to settle the law upon the subject.

Mr. MANN. Does this provide for appeal from the State courts to the United States court of appeals?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman tell us briefly what change this bill makes in the existing law?

Mr. HAYES. The only change it makes is that—that the committee supposed, when the law was passed, that the right of appeal existed, but the Attorney-General has decided that it does not exist, and this bill is simply to give the right of appeal.

Mr. SULZER. To either side?

Mr. HAYES. To either side.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a man makes application in the State court for citizenship. Does he have any appeal from the lower State court to the upper State court?

Mr. HAYES. He appeals directly to the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. MANN. That is what this bill provides for; but, under the practice and the law in the State court, would he have a right to appeal to the State appellate court?

Mr. HAYES. I should think that would depend on the law of the State.

Mr. MANN. Then you propose to make two appellate courts for the same decision?

Mr. HAYES. No; I do not.

Mr. MANN. But you do. Suppose the applicant makes an appeal to the State supreme court and the United States takes the appeal to the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. HAYES. There could not be such a case as that, of course.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. HAYES. Because if the applicant appealed, the judgment would be against him and in favor of the United States, and the United States would have no appeal coming. The Government, in a case of that kind, could not appeal.

Mr. MANN. Both parties can appeal a case.

Mr. HAYES. But not in a case where there is but one question at issue.

Mr. SULZER. The successful party seldom appeals. It is generally the defeated party that appeals a case.

Mr. HAYES. So far as the successful party is concerned, the statutes of the United States would control, and the appeal of the defeated party would lie to the circuit court of appeals of the United States.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I should like to ask the gentleman if he or the committee have considered how many cases of this sort would probably go to the Supreme Court of the United States? Would not the Supreme Court be flooded with litigation of this sort?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly not. It is only on questions of law that any appeal can be taken. There would be very few cases.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has the committee considered the expense that a man might be put to pending an appeal?

Mr. HAYES. I do not see that he would be put to any expense at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Suppose the court issues him his naturalization or his first papers and the Government appeals.

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How would he protect himself in the upper court?

Mr. HAYES. If he desired to be represented by attorney, he could be.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then this means the employment of an attorney by a poor man who may be applying for naturalization?

Mr. HAYES. If he chooses, but he would not be obliged to do so. The Government would protect his rights, no doubt.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no method of providing him with counsel at Government expense?

Mr. HAYES. Oh, no; of course not.

Mr. SULZER. Has this bill been favorably reported?

Mr. HAYES. It has been unanimously reported by the Immigration and Naturalization Committee.

Mr. SABATH. When?

Mr. HAYES. In the first part of the session.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this bill should have been referred in the first instance to the Committee on the Judiciary. However, I shall not object to its consideration.

Mr. HAYES. No; it does not belong to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the opposite side. Think what injustice and hardship there is to the applicant whose petition is denied. Now, I have a case brought to my attention from Brooklyn where the judge denied the petition of a man on the ground that the man could not read and write English. There is no such provision in the law. That would raise the question of law, of course, and yet that man is barred from citizenship, and his son, who became 21 years of age three days after the denial, who had studied law, is prevented from taking his law examinations in our State.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] states that the object of this proposed law or of the amendment of the law is to harmonize and unify the decisions on naturalization throughout the United States. It seems to me wrong that the poor man applying for citizenship in the United States should be compelled to bear a large part of the cost of so settling and unifying the law. If it is proposed to amend the present law so as to unify and harmonize the decisions, some provision ought to be made for defraying the expense of that work and not throw it on the shoulders of the poor applicant.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If you deny the right of appeal, you bar out the applicant who is entitled to naturalization and who is denied naturalization by the courts.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will.

Mr. TAWNEY. To what extent have cases arisen where there would be any injustice whatever under existing law, where there has been a denial of citizenship?

Mr. BENNET of New York. That, of course, nobody is able to answer, because where there is no right of appeal we never hear about the case. The applicant is beaten and is down and out, and that is all there is about it.

Mr. TAWNEY. But you do know how many applicants have been denied citizenship since the naturalization law went into effect.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I have not the figures in my mind.

Mr. TAWNEY. The number is comparatively small.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Several hundred.

Mr. TAWNEY. Not exceeding a hundred.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. SABATH. Let me say to the gentleman that the number is large.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; several hundred. There were sixty denied citizenship in one day at Schenectady, N. Y.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not also the fact that in the proceedings for naturalization under existing law the Government of the United States has not only the means, but has a force of examiners and assistant attorneys for the purpose of investigating all questions pertaining to the rights of applicants for citizenship, and an attorney appears for the Government of the United States, and if there is any controversy the applicant can appear by attorney also, can he not?

Mr. BENNET of New York. He can.

Mr. TAWNEY. Was it not the original intention when this new law was reported from the gentleman's committee and passed that the court determining the question or hearing the applicant and his evidence should make his decision, and that that decision would be a final decision on the question whether or not the applicant should be admitted to citizenship?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; on questions of fact.

Mr. HAYES. But not on questions of law.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why did not the law provide for determining questions of law?

Mr. BENNET of New York. We thought that it could go up under existing statutes.

Mr. HAYES. We supposed that the question could go up on questions of law under existing statute.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the applicant should be denied admission in the State court, how could he appeal from the decision of the State court?

Mr. HAYES. Straight to the circuit court of appeals of the United States.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then you have a conflict between the State and the Federal jurisdictions?

Mr. HAYES. Not at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. In the matter of determining the rights of citizenship?

Mr. HAYES. Not at all. He appeals under the law of the United States, and it would go to the United States circuit court of appeals.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will allow me, does the appeal act as a supersedeas?

Mr. HAYES. I suppose it sometimes would; appeals often act as a supersedeas.

Mr. SHERLEY. Some do and some do not.

Mr. HAYES. I do not know that I can inform the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Until we can be informed we are not in a position to vote. We might be willing to let the Government take an appeal for the sake of getting the law clear if it did not affect the rights of the applicant for citizenship, whereas we would not be willing to do it if it did. We ought to know whether the appeal acts as a supersedeas or not.

Mr. HAYES. Perhaps the gentleman can answer that better than I can.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not familiar enough with the naturalization law to state offhand.

Mr. HAYES. My judgment would be that generally it would not. That is what I would say. I have not examined the question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Would not the ordinary supersedeas procedure apply to this statute as a matter of fact?

Mr. HAYES. I should think it would.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The right of appeal is granted, and, of course, it would carry with it all of the incident rights and privileges in that class of cases.

Mr. HAYES. I should think it would.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. So that I do not think there is any doubt about the right of supersedeas.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think there is any information given to the House by the report of the bill itself, which shows what the effect of this bill would be as to the arrest of the judgment of the lower court, and in the absence of some definite statement I should feel compelled to object to the consideration of the bill in this way. It is not a proper way to bring this bill before the House. The gentleman has brought us no information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I object.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that it is not competent for the gentleman from Nebraska to object.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserved the right to object.

Mr. HAYES. That is true. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] could object, but not the gentleman from Nebraska.

The SPEAKER. This is a request for unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time, and under the practice that has grown up, which has been acquiesced in by the House and which is for the convenience of the House, by sufferance the merits of the question are often gone into under a reserving of the right to object. Until there is no objection the bill can not be considered by unanimous consent, because there is an absence of the unanimous consent.

FERRYBOATS BETWEEN ANGEL ISLAND AND SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16515) authorizing the purchase of a steel ferryboat for use between Angel Island and San Francisco, Cal., and a steel cutter for use of immigration officials at San Francisco, Cal., which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and to consider the same at this time in the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized to secure by purchase or construction a steel ferryboat at a cost not exceeding $115,000, to be used in the immigration service between Angel Island and San Francisco, Cal., and a steel cutter, at a cost not to exceed $25,000, for the use of the officials of the immigration service at San Francisco, Cal.

With the following amendment:

Line 5, after the word "hundred," strike out the words "and fifteen," so that it will read:
"At a cost not exceeding $100,000."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to state to the gentleman in charge of this bill that the Committee on Appropriations had referred to it at the beginning of this session estimates, and is now considering estimates, for the construction of the vessel referred to in this bill. I do not think the proposition is one that ought to be considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. HAYES. This bill does not undertake to make any appropriation. It only undertakes to authorize the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Appropriations could not bring in the item; it would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman if it is proposed to move the immigrant station at San Francisco or has it already been moved?

Mr. HAYES. It has been moved.

Mr. MANN. How far from where it was before?

Mr. HAYES. It is 4 or 5 miles.

Mr. MANN. Across the bay?

Mr. HAYES. It is on an island in the bay, 4 or 5 miles from the city.

Mr. MANN. That is where the vessels all stop?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; that is where they will stop.

Mr. MANN. Immigrants are all landed there?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What means do they have now of getting back and forth from the island to the shore?

Mr. HAYES. They have no means. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that the immigrant station in San Francisco heretofore has been a shed in the city. There is just being completed a new immigrant station on Angel Island, in San Francisco Bay, and it will be impossible to use that station without some means of getting back and forth from the mainland to the island, and this steel ferryboat is for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I made inquiry about this, I may say to the gentleman, and was informed by officers who ought to know that the cost of the boat that was provided was probably needed, because this island was located at such a place that the swells from the sea coming into the bay were very heavy, and it required an extraordinarily large boat. The usual cost for boats of that character elsewhere has been about $10,000—I do not mean for the big ferryboats.

Mr. HAYES. The ferryboat that is used at Ellis Island cost $125,000.

Mr. MANN. I am talking about the other boat which is provided for in the bill.

Mr. HAYES. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. One is for the benefit of the officials, and one for the benefit of the immigrants.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman perfectly satisfied from his own investigation that they need $25,000 for the official boat?

Mr. HAYES. The use of the cutter provided for——

Mr. MANN. They call it a cutter, but it is a boat, not a cutter; that is a wrong term.

Mr. HAYES. Well, it is a boarding boat that the immigration officials use to go out and meet incoming vessels and board them. As the gentleman has stated, the boat will be used in that part of the bay where the swell is at times very heavy. Raccoon Strait is the name of the strait where the wind and swells come down, and it is necessary to have a pretty substantial boat in order at times to stand that swell.

Mr. TAWNEY. What evidence did the gentleman's committee have with reference to the necessity of appropriating $25,000 for this boat, which is merely for the accommodation of the immigration officials going out to meet vessels?

Mr. HAYES. Well, we have no knowledge except our personal knowledge of the situation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has any member of the committee any practical knowledge in regard to the construction of vessels or the cost of vessels?

Mr. HAYES. Somewhat; yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. You took no testimony at all to show what the cost of the vessel is?

Mr. HAYES. We took the testimony of the gentlemen of the Department of Commerce and Labor who have had this matter in charge at other places, that is all.

Mr. TAWNEY. They simply estimated it would cost that much?

Mr. HAYES. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why did not your committee authorize this expenditure in the same act to be paid out of the permanent indefinite immigration appropriation?

Mr. HAYES. We supposed the Appropriations Committee would authorize that.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the Appropriations Committee authorizes that, it will be subject to a point of order, because you authorize here the construction of these vessels generally within a limit of cost just the same as any other vessel in the Revenue-Cutter Service or any other service, like public buildings. Now, the question arises, if the Committee on Appropriations in carrying an appropriation to carry into effect this authorization provides that appropriation shall be paid out of the head tax, then would it not be competent for you or any Member of the House to make a point of order against that provision?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so.

Mr. HAYES. I should say not.

Mr. MANN. I think the Committee on Appropriations would have the authority to make a report saying out of what funds the appropriation should be paid. They would not have authority to report an appropriation for a boat which was not authorized.

Mr. TAWNEY. If that is so, the Committee on Appropriations would have authority to report an appropriation for the construction of these vessels.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. Absolutely.

Mr. MANN. It would not have without authority of Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. The authority of the Committee on Appropriations with respect to directing what shall be paid out of that fund relates only to those things that pertain to the immigration service specifically——

Mr. MANN. This pertains to it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Which have been specifically authorized by law?

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman from Minnesota would certainly not contend that an appropriation that had not been authorized by law would not be subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYES, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

OBSOLETE SPRINGFIELD RIFLES, ETC., FOR OLD GUARD AT COLUMBUS, OHIO.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4780) which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4780) to authorize the Secretary of War to make certain disposition of obsolete Springfield rifles, caliber .45, bayonets, and bayonet scabbards for same.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to donate to independent military companies, whose membership is composed entirely of veterans of the war of the rebellion, such number of obsolete Springfield rifles, .45-caliber, bayonets, and bayonet scabbards for same, not to exceed 100 to a single organization, which may not be needed in the service of said Department. Such donation shall be made subject to rules and regulations covering the same in the Department, and the Government shall be at no expense in connection with any such donation.

The amendments were read, as follows:

After the words "donate to" in line 4 insert the words "The Old Guard an."

Strike out the word "companies" in line 4 and insert in lieu therof the words "organizations of Columbus, Ohio."

Strike out the word "veterans" in line 5 and insert in lieu thereof the words "Union soldiers."

Strike out the words "to a single organization" in line 8.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand that as amended the bill simply authorizes the Secretary of War to issue a certain number of these guns to a certain organization?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. One hundred obsolete .45-caliber Springfield guns and side arms to a company known as the Old Guard.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And as amended it is restricted simply to that company alone?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. To that company alone.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FLATHEAD INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3640) to amend sections 9 and 14, chapter 1495, of the Statutes of the United States of America, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The bill, with several committee amendments thereto, was read at length.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] will not insist on his objection. This is a meritorious measure and one of great importance to my State, and especially to the people residing in the northwestern portion thereof. The bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. It has come under the scrutiny of the Director of the Reclamation Service, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Committee on the Public Lands in both the Senate and House, and has received a unanimous report in favor of its passage from both committees. This bill is for the purpose of amending sections 9 and 14, chapter 1495, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which was an act for the survey and allotment of lands embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation in Montana.

This act provided for the allotment of the lands in severalty to the Indians and for the sale of surplus lands. There was a provision in the act for the use of one-half of the proceeds of sales of lands for the construction of irrigation works on the reservation. Under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior extensive surveys were made in that locality, and it was discovered later on, as a result of these surveys, that large areas of land could be irrigated and that if some provision were made to allow the Secretary to use all of the proceeds of sales of lands, or all that might be needed for the construction of a complete irrigation system, that these lands could be made as fertile and productive as any in the State, and that such results could be accomplished at an extremely reasonable cost per acre.

Just what the cost per acre would be I am unable to state at this time as the work has not progressed to that point where exact figures can be given. But I am assured that the cost will be low, and that no better or more feasible project for irrigation purposes could anywhere be found. I might add here that appropriations have already been made for preliminary irrigation work, and the Indian appropriation bill of the present session carries an additional sum for the completion of surveys and the beginning of work of construction of the irrigation system. After the completion of the work the moneys unexpended are to be divided among the Indians. Under the terms of this act the Indians will receive their lands by allotment free from charge for the cost of construction, but the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to take out of the general fund their proportionate part of the cost for constructing the system.

As the bill came to the House committee the lands allotted to the Indians were to be exempted from cost of operation and maintenance, but after careful consideration of the facts it appeared that about three-fourths of the irrigable lands would go to the Indians, and for that reason it was considered unjust to place the burden of maintaining the entire system upon the one-fourth who would purchase the lands. It was thought that a prudent investor would hesitate before assuming the responsibility of carrying the entire cost of operation and maintenance.

It will be seen that the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors, as prescribed by law, are not to be abridged. The entryman who settles upon land under this system must not only comply with the provisions of the homestead laws, but must reclaim at least one-half of that part of his entry irrigable for agricultural purposes, and must pay the charges against his tract before he will be entitled to a patent. The other details of the bill in this and other respects are easily understood. The report of the Secretary of the Interior, written in reference to Senate bill 2086, which is the same as Senate bill 3640, as modified by the adoption of the Secretary's recommendation, is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 20, 1907.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of S. 2086, "A bill to amend sections 9 and 14, chapter 1495, Statutes of the United States of America" (33 Stat. L., 302), being an act for the survey and allotment of lands in the Flathead Reservation, Mont., and the sale and disposal of the surplus lands.

The bill purports to amend section 9 of the act, but the section in the bill is an exact copy, word for word, of the same section as it reads in the act, except for a typographical error in line 4, page 2, whereby the word "of" is substituted for the word "or."

There is, however, an important amendment (p. 3) to section 10, which appears to be germane to section 9. It is apparent that this amendment was intended to follow the original section 9, and the bill should be amended by striking out lines 12 to 20 and the words "allotted in severalty to an Indian," in line 21, page 3.

The amendment to section 9 consists of a proviso relating to irrigable lands and is the same as a draft of an item prepared by the Director of the Reclamation Service and submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The provisions follow in general the terms of the reclamation act, with some slight modifications which experience has shown to be advantageous.

There is one paragraph, however, providing for an exchange of allotted lands, line 19, page 6, to line 2, page 7, which does not meet my approval.

In the first place, commissioners are now in the field classifying and appraising the unallotted lands. If an exchange of lands should be allowed and the Indians in any considerable number should take advantage of the provision, it would delay the appraisement by compelling the commission to go over the ground a second time and postpone the date when the surplus lands can be opened.

In the second place, the exchange of 1 acre of irrigable land for 3 acres of grazing land does not seem fair to the Indians. The true proportion would be nearer 10 to 1 than 3 to 1. Moreover, an allottee can not receive irrigable land in excess of 80 acres, which is more than enough to provide for his needs, while 240 acres of grazing land would be of little, if any, use. I therefore recommend that the paragraph (from line 19, p. 6, to line 2, p. 7, both inclusive) be stricken out.

Section 14 of the act provides that after deducting the expenses of the commission of classification and sale of lands, and such other incidental expenses as shall have been necessarily incurred, and expenses of the survey of the lands, one-half of the proceeds shall be expended from time to time by the Secretary of the Interior, as he may deem advisable, for the benefit of the Indians and those having tribal rights on the reservation, in the construction of irrigation ditches, purchase of stock cattle, farming implements, or other necessary articles to aid the Indians in farming and stock raising and in the education and civilization of said Indians, and that the remaining half shall be paid to said Indians or expended on their account, as they may elect.

Under the proposed amendment the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, after deducting the expenses mentioned in the act, to expend so much of the proceeds as he may deem advisable in the construction of irrigation systems for the irrigation of the irrigable lands within the limits of the reservation, one-half of the money remaining after the construction of the irrigation system to be expended as provided in the original section and the remaining one-half to be paid to the Indians and persons holding tribal rights on the reservation, annually, share and share alike.

I do not know of any objection to this amendment, except that the last sentence, providing for payment annually, is somewhat indefinite. It is suggested that the words "as the same shall become available" be inserted after the word "annually" in line 2, page 8.

I have the honor to recommend that the bill, with the modifications suggested, receive the favorable consideration of your committee.

Respectfully,

JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD,
Secretary.

Hon. MOSES E. CLAPP,
Chairman of Committee on Indian Affairs,
United States Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, this is a rather long and complicated act, dealing with rather an important matter. The House will have no sort of opportunity to judge it upon its merits on a request for unanimous consent. I feel, therefore, compelled to object, at least, until I can have an opportunity to examine the act.

COLLINWOOD DISASTER.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Chair will lay before the House the following letter from the mayor of Cleveland, acknowledging a resolution of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

CITY OF CLEVELAND, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
March 19, 1908.

Hon J. G. CANNON,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: On behalf of the city of Cleveland, I beg leave to express through you, to the House of Representatives of the United States the appreciation of the people of Cleveland and Collinwood of the resolution of March 4, 1908, extending the sympathy of the House of Representatives upon the occasion of the burning of a schoolhouse in Collinwood and the great loss of lives of children therein.

Although Collinwood is an independent municipality, it is immediately adjacent to Cleveland, and forms with our city a single community. This disaster is common to us all, and the considerate sympathy of the House of Representatives is appreciated by the inhabitants of both cities, which share the sorrow of the disaster.

I have the honor to be,
Very truly, yours,

TOM L. JOHNSON, Mayor.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bill H. R. 19355—the fortification appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House do resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the fortification appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to four hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HASKINS. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will withhold his motion for a moment. As I understand, under the rules of the House the Committee on War Claims are entitled to this day, but the Committee on Appropriations desire to go along with the fortification bill, and I am also informed that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture desires to follow with the agricultural appropriation bill as soon as the fortification bill is disposed of.

Now, of course I recognize, as all other Members of the House ought to, the importance of disposing of these supply bills, and I am willing to give way to-day, providing another day can be substituted for this day for the consideration of the war claims bill on the Private Calendar. Therefore I ask that the House set apart for the consideration of the war claims bill on the Private Calendar the first legislative day after the disposal of the agricultural appropriation bill, provided, of course, that that bill follows the fortification bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HASKINS] asks unanimous consent that the first legislative day after the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill has been completed by the House may be set apart for business in order under the rules to-day.

Mr. MANN. That is the first day after?

Mr. HASKINS. The first legislative day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19355, the fortification appropriation bill, with Mr. WANGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the fortification appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19355) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I now yield such time as he may desire to my colleague on the committee [Mr. GRAFF.]

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, the work of constructing fortifications in the United States does not enlist the interest, either upon the part of the House or the country, that it deserves. The Navy is recognized as by far the most popular war arm of the Government with the people at large. It appeals to their imagination. It has to do with the maintenance of our dignity and power abroad, but as a purely defensive instrument the fortifications of our country have a right to favorable comparison even with that of the Navy. And the history of the development of our fortifications is one full of interest as well as of importance to the country.

It is not generally understood that, after all, while the Navy is a means of defense it is principally for offensive operations, and that a system of fortifications is needed to properly supplement the operations of the Navy. Our fortifications are for the purpose not only of protecting our merchant marine—and we have considerable shipping engaged, especially in our coastwise trade, because we have exclusive control over that—but it is also for the protection of our cities, and for the purpose of protecting our own naval bases, and to prevent the enemy from entering our important harbors and turning them into a base of their own.

But we gather from the information that we received in the hearings from expert sources that it is not expected that the fortifications, no matter how excellent, can prevent the landing of troops along our extensive coast; and for the repelling of all that, after all, we have to depend upon the military forces on the land.

This bill has certain characteristics about it differing materially from any appropriation bill which is brought into the House for consideration. The fortification bill is brought in in pursuance of well-defined and accepted plans of operation, and therefore has in view in each of the yearly appropriations a certain degree of progress toward ultimate completion.

In 1883 the initiative was first taken toward what has finally ripened into the present Taft board plan for the fortification of our country. It is an interesting fact that the President of the United States states in a message which he sent to Congress in January, 1906, "that our coast defenses, as they existed in 1860, at the beginning of the civil war, were not surpassed in efficiency by those of any other country; but within a few years the introduction of rifled cannon and armor in the navies of the world, against which the smoothbore guns were practically useless, rendered them obsolete," and he continues, as follows: "For many years no attempt was made to remedy the deficiencies of these seacoast fortifications." The country was busy with the problems which were the outgrowth of the civil war and the development of our almost untouched vast natural resources.

It was not until 1883 that Congress passed the first act, on March 3, known as the "gun-foundry act," providing for an examination and report to Congress which of the navy-yards or arsenals owned by the Government had the best location and was best adapted for the establishment of a gun factory, and what other method should be adopted for the manufacture of heavy ordnance adapted to modern warfare for the use of the Army and Navy of the United States.

There was a report made, in 1884, by the gun-factory board, appointed in pursuance of the act of March 3, 1883, when the first step was taken toward the manufacture by the Government of ordnance for fortification purposes.

As a result, the act of Congress approved March 3, 1885, provided that—

> The President of the United States shall appoint a board * * * which board shall examine and report at what ports fortifications or other defenses are most urgently required, the character and kind of defenses best adapted to each with reference to armament, the utilization of torpedoes, mines, and other defensive appliances.

Under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1885, a board was organized and was known as the "Endicott board," which made their report on January 23, 1886, and in 1887 Congress commenced this series of yearly fortification appropriation acts which have followed up to the present time. But it was realized two years ago that there had been tremendous strides made in inventions with reference to munitions of war.

The fire-control system had been developed. It was but a little before the war with Spain that smokeless powder reached its perfection, and the rapid-fire guns and guns of high power began to be developed, and it was apparent that there must be had some modern consideration and some changes made concerning the plan which had been recommended by the Endicott board. In pursuance of that, the President of the United States appointed a new board in 1905, known as the "Taft board," and that board assembled and considered and laid out a comprehensive plan of fortifications, making such changes with reference to the particular points that were recommended by the Endicott board as they saw fit, withdrawing several of the points for fortification which had been recommended by the Endicott board, and adding four or five new points on our coast which they recommended should be fortified in lieu of those taken out of the Endicott board's recommendation; and that report from the Taft board was presented to Congress in a message of the President on March 5, 1906.

The total estimate for the completion of the Taft board plan in continental United States alone was and is $112,964,760.98. In addition to the recommendation of plans for fortifications in continental United States the Taft board recommends also a comprehensive plan for fortifications on our insular possessions, the estimate of which is $22,716,360, making the total estimated cost for the completion of the Taft board plan in our insular possessions and in continental United States $135,681,120.98.

This does not include a recommendation which is a part of the Taft plan for the fortification of the Isthmian Canal, at Colon and Panama, which is something over $4,000,000, not including the cost of the acquirement of the land upon which to place the fortifications at those points.

I might say here that the figures which I have given as the estimates for the completion of the Taft plan in our insular possessions and in continental United States do not include any estimates for the acquirement of land or for service or practice powder, which make out a considerable portion of the fortification bill each year.

Now, it may be interesting to note the progress which has been made since 1887, when the Endicott board plan was first begun upon, to the present time. There have been approximately $72,000,000 appropriated and expended upon the continental United States part of the Taft plan, so that, according to the estimates of Army officers who appeared before us in the hearings, we have progressed at the present time and completed substantially 62 per cent of the Taft plan in continental United States.

The basis of that estimate is not made upon the ratio of the total estimates to the expenditures which have been made, but has been calculated upon a safer basis, as the officials of the War Department thought. They based it upon the number of guns which have been established and the batteries completed, of the entire number of units making up the work in the Taft plan in the United States.

I might say in addition to this that there have been some departures made in the manner of the work of our committee with reference to the examination and consideration of this bill during the present session of Congress from that which has been heretofore adopted. Heretofore we have not attempted to have in view particular batteries placed at particular points in the United States. Prior to this session I think we have taken into consideration to some extent the aggregate which it was thought Congress could afford to expend and the proper proportion which the fortification appropriations ought to bear to the total amount which it was supposed we would be warranted in expending, taking into consideration the condition of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Appropriations have jurisdiction over this bill?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. MANN. They do not have jurisdiction over the other bills relating to the military branches of the Government, either the Army or the Navy?

Mr. GRAFF. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Since I have been a Member of this House we have very greatly increased the appropriations for the Navy and the Army. We think nothing, apparently, of appropriating or providing for a battle ship that will cost more than the total of the fortification appropriation bill every year. Has the committee taken all that into consideration in determining the proportionate amount that ought to be expended for fortifications?

Mr. GRAFF. We certainly have. In other words, we have been driven, to be candid about the matter, to determining what would be left after these other appropriations had been passed by Congress.

Mr. MANN. I have sometimes wondered whether the Committee on Appropriations, which brings in the great appropriation bills, outside of the post-office, the Army, and Navy, as far as amount is concerned, did not feel that as long as the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs were so extremely liberal with the money of the Government that the Committee on Appropriations must of necessity be quite economical with that portion of the military branch which came under its control.

Mr. GRAFF. Candidly, I do not believe that the Appropriations Committee has been niggardly or parsimonious with reference to this appropriation. I made the statement that we had taken into consideration the total amount of previous bills largely in determining what amount should be expended in a particular year for fortifications, having some view to the balance of the expenditures of the Government; but I may also say, and I wish to emphasize the fact, that that was not principally borne in mind during the consideration of the present bill.

I want to say that, because there are figures connected with this bill which might lead to another conclusion, growing out of the fact that there has been recommended by the War Department for the appropriations for fortifications during the coming fiscal year the enormous sum of $38,443,945.36, and that the committee bring a bill to this House which carries the sum of only $8,210,611, and that the amount of appropriations recommended by us is $30,233,334.36 less than the estimates submitted. Now, a superficial conclusion, reached from a consideration of these figures alone, might lead some people to think that we bore in mind only the effort to appropriate as little as possible, when that, as a matter of fact, was not true. Now, with reference to this recommendation by the Secretary of War, for whom I entertain the highest respect and greatest admiration, this estimate was made in the spring of 1907, and there has been no change made in that estimate since.

That estimate was made upon the conditions which existed in the spring of 1907 and not upon the conditions which existed in March, 1908, some nine months later. The conditions of the Treasury were different in the spring of 1907 than they are in the month of March, 1908. The world's conditions were different, perhaps, in the spring of 1907 than they are in March, 1908. Now, then, the policy of the committee with reference to dealing with these fortification bills in prior years, as I have said, was based upon making appropriations without having any particular units in view and without having in view essentially any particular points of work in continental United States. But after consideration of the bill and the hearing of the testimony from the chiefs of the bureaus of the War Department we made our recommendation, segregating, not as to particular points that were to be fortified, but segregating in separate appropriations for particular parts of the work of the completed battery.

As a result of that there accumulated available balances from year to year, and some two years ago, which covers the length of my experience upon that subcommittee, there was an effort made to reduce these available balances which the officials of the War Department desired from their standpoint to meet unexpected emergencies.

There was also a policy running through the making of these appropriations for twenty years, and that was that there should be no particular points of fortification mentioned in the bill, because of the desire for secrecy with reference to these fortifications. I have come to think that this reason for the War Department policy has become largely a fiction.

I can see a much more logical reason for not making any specific location of points of construction in the country, and that is that while we may make our calculations and appropriate with a view to the completion of certain units of work at particular points, so long as as we do not mention the points in the bill, we leave room for sudden emergency and full play for large discretion of the War Department in devoting that money to the development and fortification at unexpected points, and for an emergency arising after the passage of the bill which we could not anticipate. Now, there was in the consideration of this bill during the present year another important and, I think, a very desirable departure, and that was that there should be appropriations made upon such lines as we thought might keep pace with the actual advance by units toward the completion of the Taft plan of fortification; so in this hearing we went into an examination of the subject at greater length than has ever been had, as I am informed, during the life of these appropriations, and each point was carefully examined.

The Chief of Artillery, the Chief of Ordnance, the Chief of the Signal Corps, and the Chief of the Engineer Corps, all distinguished men in their profession, were called before us and carefully examined with reference to which would be the preferable points in the order of importance. The committee only reserved to itself the function of determining how many points of defense should be taken up.

The second determination of the committee was, since during the past eighteen years much of the larger part of the fortification appropriation was devoted to the fortifying of the Atlantic coast, that, therefore, in the present bill the proceeds of the appropriation should be devoted almost exclusively to the fortifications upon the Pacific coast.

Now, with reference to the amount that we have carried in this bill, when it is compared with any other figures save the estimates in the spring of 1907, it assumes generous proportions. The average amount of appropriations made during the last twenty years, yearly, is $5,475,687.45, making the total appropriation in the present bill exceed the average of the last twenty years by the very respectable sum of $2,734,923.55.

In addition to that there has been carried in this bill the largest amount of appropriations for our insular possessions that has ever been carried in any appropriation bill. Of the total of $8,200,000 there has been appropriated for our insular possessions the sum of $3,168,500. Now, with relation to the points on the Pacific coast which have been considered, it is very easy for us to intelligently take these in. The important points, in fact the only points which have been recommended on the Pacific coast for consideration by the Taft board, are Puget Sound, Columbia River, San Diego, and San Francisco.

We found from the officials of the War Department in charge of this work that they have already sufficient funds to complete the fortifications at San Francisco, and we were assured that San Francisco from every reasonable standpoint could be considered as impregnable, and the only item that was even suggested in connection with further appropriations for San Francisco Bay was the acquisition of a piece of land adjoining the proposed works, and the reply was made that since they have gotten along without it for a long while there was no reason why that could not be reasonably postponed.

With relation to Columbia River there were provided fire control and searchlights so as to complete that unit. At San Diego there were provided submarine mines, and, in fact, ample appropriations were made under the advice of General Murray, Chief of Artillery, for the entire Pacific coast, the Atlantic coast, and our insular possessions for submarine mines. While I am speaking of submarine mines, I might say that during the testimony of General Murray he speaks in the highest terms of submarine mines, and said further that, so far as that instrument of war was concerned, he was perfectly willing to have the world advised of its efficiency. He says, on page 196 of the hearings:

> Recent war has shown clearly the value of submarine mines as an element of harbor defense. If a harbor is defended by an efficient system of mines and the requisite guns for their protection against countermining, sweeping, or other methods of removing them, it is not believed that an enemy, however enterprising, will ever attempt to force an entrance into a harbor with large ships. This conclusion has been supported strongly by the terrible destruction wrought by submarine mines at Port Arthur, Dalny, and Vladivostok during the Russo-Japanese war.

Then he says this significant thing:

> Our system of submarine mines is practically perfect as a war weapon. Being under complete electrical control from the shore, the lines of mines may be rendered instantly destructive to an enemy or harmless to passing friendly vessels.

Mr. KAHN. I understand the bill which the committee has reported provides for a vessel to properly mine the different harbors of the Pacific.

Mr. GRAFF. A torpedo planter. I am glad the gentleman spoke about that. Under the advice of the Chief of Artillery, the bill carries an additional torpedo planter for the Pacific coast, and also one torpedo planter for the Hawaiian Islands. There is either available funds for the construction of another one, or there has already been constructed another one for the Pacific coast.

Mr. KAHN. It has not been constructed as yet, but the funds are available.

Mr. GRAFF. Now, then, with reference to Puget Sound, we were advised by the War Department, when we were balancing the bill and seeking to reach and appropriate for everything which should be in reason during the present year, that Deception Pass, which is another inlet or entrance into Puget Sound, should be provided for, and we took the figures necessary for the completion of that unit—electrical apparatus, guns, fire control, emplacements—so that it would be a complete work; that is the new policy which we have adopted, which is distinctive in this bill.

With reference to the Hawaiian Islands, we realized that the country is greatly interested in Pearl Harbor and its becoming a naval base of the United States, and we all know that while other considerations may have entered into the reasons for our acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands, after all its importance as a strategic base in the midst of the Pacific was the controlling cause.

The question whether we should, during the present year, make appropriations for the fortifications of the entrance to Pearl Harbor came before us and was very carefully considered and at great length, and we based our conclusions upon the testimony of the officials of the War Department, and those alone. It developed before the hearing was taken that there was no reliable information as to the estimates of cost or amount of excavation which might be made in order to deepen and widen the entrance to Pearl Harbor. We were informed by an official at the Navy Department that in his judgment it would require something like a million and a half cubic yards. Later, by cable, information was sought in the Hawaiian Islands as to what amount of excavation would be required and what would be the probable cost of the improvements to Pearl Harbor. We found that the figures increased as we got nearer to the base where the facts existed, whatever they were. I read now from page 40 of the hearings:

> Mr. SMITH. Are you able to tell us what amount of excavation is necessary to open Pearl channel in accordance with the plans of the Navy to a depth of 35 feet, and what amount would be required to open it to a depth of 30 feet?

General MACKENZIE. I have estimates for the cubic yards and for the units of price.

Mr. SMITH. You might read that and let it go into the record.

General MACKENZIE. The estimate which is furnished me by cable is that the Navy plan for a 35-foot channel would require the removal of 2,253,705 cubic yards at a cost of 60 cents per yard, and 1,245,130 cubic yards at a cost of $1 per yard. For a 30-foot channel it would require the removal of 1,786,691 cubic yards at 60 cents, and 960,067 yards at $1. Now, I have not anything showing what that Navy plan is, but I am expecting the papers.

Mr. SMITH. At one time you did do $100,000 worth of dredging in Pearl channel?

General MACKENZIE. Yes; across the bar at the mouth.

Mr. SMITH. I wish when you get the proofs of your hearing you would fill in the exact width and depth of that channel as shown by the records in your office. (200 feet wide and fully 30 feet, generally 31 feet, deep at low water entirely across the bar from deep water in the ocean to deep water in the harbor. Annual Report Chief of Engineers U. S. Army, for 1905, p. 710.)

General MACKENZIE. Yes.

The General afterwards inserted his answer. Now, then, here was a work which was involving practically from $2,500,000 to $3,000,000 of excavation to enter the channel before the question of fortification would be a live subject.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GRAFF. I do.

Mr. KEIFER. I am reading here what you read, and come to the conclusion that this last estimate was made on the theory of building a wide canal up to the harbor from the deep water in the ocean. Is it not a fact that, with the exception of very few battle ships, they can go in there now without any deepening of the channel, except that they can not go with their own steam?

Mr. GRAFF. I will say as to that, of course I would have to depend for any answer that would be worth anything upon the authority that has come to me from other sources, who are supposed to be expert. I gather from the hearings which we had that while it was true that the depth of water was not the fatal impediment in the way——

Mr. KEIFER. Is not there plenty of depth now?

Mr. GRAFF. That the tortuous character of the entrance and its narrowness render it impossible for a hostile fleet, for instance, to occupy that as a base of operation. Of course that would be the only danger to the United States so long as we have nothing there to defend at Pearl Harbor.

Mr. KEIFER. I am not criticising the committee as to the appropriation, but I do not think the gentleman wants to leave the impression that we could not make a channel into the harbor so that we could put our fleets in there in safety by a comparatively small amount of money expended in straightening out such places. The channel is wide enough, except at bends, now for any ship of the ocean, is it not?

Mr. GRAFF. I suppose that is true.

Mr. KEIFER. You have seen it?

Mr. GRAFF. I entered Pearl Harbor on a 700-ton tug with the gentleman in May, 1907.

Mr. KEIFER. Which would enable you to see everything that is there?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes; I attempted to do so.

Mr. KEIFER. The difficulty is always in making the turnings where the projections of the land made it necessary to wind about, and if you cut the points off—in other words, did not the officer who took us in, the engineer officer, point out that it would take comparatively little to make an entrance for the largest ships that there are in our Navy? I do not mean for sailing in and out as though——

Mr. GRAFF. You mean for an absolute entrance by one of our ships?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; under its own power.

Mr. GRAFF. I doubt that.

Mr. KEIFER. In its present condition I agree, but this is the point I would like to ask a further question. If we open the channelway we can go rapidly in and out there, and if we can get our vessels in there and they are safe, and we can have egress from there when we want to go, why do we want a great channel dug such as seems to be contemplated by the statement which was just read?

Mr. GRAFF. Well, I will say in reply to the gentleman that I have some respect for the recommendation of the War and Navy Departments on this subject, and I am not certain, however, whether the gentleman is right or they are. However that may be, this is not a matter over which this committee has any jurisdiction. It only comes in here incidentally to show that in a logical order of work it lies upon Congress to first determine whether they propose to have a naval base in Pearl Harbor, and after that has been determined and the channel opened and a naval base established and a dry dock brought in, there will then be something to defend.

Mr. KEIFER. I am not criticising you about that.

Mr. GRAFF. I understand the gentleman from Ohio agrees with me on that subject. That is the point I desire to make——

Mr. KEIFER. But I do not think the committee should be magnifying the fact that we should have to spend a large amount of money to get our fleet in there.

Mr. GRAFF. I am not attempting to magnify it, however, and I will say for the purpose of making it right in my remarks——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two. Does the gentleman's committee propose to make a really strong base at Pearl Harbor?

Mr. GRAFF. We have nothing to do with that, because the committee has no jurisdiction over the subject.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You are appropriating the money.

Mr. GRAFF. We are not now appropriating any money for Pearl Harbor except for the purpose of putting in fire control, electrical power, and so forth, to operate a battery of two guns which exists there already and which is used there now for the incidental protection of Honolulu.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The great argument in favor of annexing the Sandwich Islands was that by a proper expenditure of money Pearl Harbor could be made as strong as Gibraltar.

Mr. GRAFF. I have just said that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That was the argument they rolled me on when I was fighting the annexation of those islands.

Mr. GRAFF. I think we all agree with you.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, you have had them for ten years. They said that was the key to the Pacific, that they had to have them for national defense. They have had them for ten years and have never taken any substantial steps to make that place as strong as Gibraltar, or as strong as anywhere else.

Mr. GRAFF. Does not the gentleman recognize that this committee can have no jurisdiction over any part of the subject except fortifications, which in logical order comes afterwards, when there is something to fortify?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is what I want you to do—to appropriate money enough at this session of Congress. I do not care whether this committee has jurisdiction of it or not, or what committee has jurisdiction of it; I want that committee to appropriate enough money to carry out the statement and promise that enabled the annexationists to down us in 1898 and annex those islands.

Mr. GRAFF. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that there is now pending in the House, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES], a bill which proposes to do just what the gentleman suggests, carrying a total appropriation of $757,000, which includes as a start—not a very large start, but a start, nevertheless—upon the improvement of the entrance to Pearl Harbor the building of a dry dock, the construction of a naval base, and the commencement of the very work which the gentleman has inquired about, but that bill would initiate the work and authorize by law further appropriations.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES], or somebody else, has waked up.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it not also true that land has already been set aside for this naval station?

Mr. GRAFF. It belongs to the Government. It has been acquired by the Government. Pearl Harbor is undoubtedly one of the greatest harbors in the world for a naval base. It is landlocked, and so situated a fleet could not be observed from the sea, and has an area of 10 square miles; 6 miles in an air line on the west of Honolulu. It is just within the gun range of Honolulu, of this one battery, which has already been established. Captain Mahan said years ago it was large enough to hold all the navies of the world.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the question of strengthening, widening, or deepening that channel would be under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. GRAFF. Absolutely.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman will pardon me, while the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] is correct, that probably it would come under the jurisdiction of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, without objection on the part of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the Naval Committee has frequently made appropriations for the improvement of places intended purely for naval bases, and it is possible an appropriation from that committee would therefore not be subject to a point of order. I trust the gentleman will pardon me for the interruption.

Mr. GRAFF. It is on that basis that the Bates bill is proposed.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The only point I wanted to bring out was that this particular committee did not have the jurisdiction on the entire improvement of Pearl Harbor.

Mr. GRAFF. I am anxious to have that brought out, too. Now, I might add here that notwithstanding the objection of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] as to the size of the estimates for the improvement of the entrance to Pearl Harbor, and its magnitude, that the War and Navy Departments insist upon a depth of 35 feet and a width of 400 instead of 200 feet, and a cutting off of the projections and a straightening of the tortuous entrance which now exist into that body of water.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to ask a single question. Is there not generally in the channel now 50 feet of water?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There is a great depth, undoubtedly.

Mr. GRAFF. The channel varies in depth. I think there are depths greater than 50 feet. I took a superficial glance at the depth as put upon the map, and I was under the impression that while there was a great deal of deep water it was at varying depths.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How much land has the United States acquired title to for these fortifications?

Mr. GRAFF. I do not really know, but a very large amount of land. Indeed, the Government has acquired some of that land for fortification purposes which may be more than will be required for that particular purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is there a city laid off adjacent to this property?

Mr. GRAFF. I had the pleasure of being there in May of last year, and there is nothing back of Pearl Harbor save the country—sugar plantations—but there is, as I remember, a trolley line which runs from Pearl Harbor to Honolulu.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I believe it was thought to establish a subdivision at one time. There are streets laid out, and all that.

Mr. GRAFF. A little premature.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is what I desire to find out, whether there was a contemplated city. I understand it is proposed to put the lots on the market, and that they are now advertising that fact.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not know of anything to prevent them from doing so.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the gentleman received any letters or memorials urging that Pearl Harbor should be fortified? I have received several of that kind.

Mr. GRAFF. I have not received any of those communications, and I would not need any such stimulus so far as I am concerned.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am with the gentleman in that. I think that this is a great national necessity—to occupy those islands.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My opinion is that this subdivision was laid out at the time the railroad was completed from Honolulu to Pearl Harbor, something like fifteen years ago—something like that. It is a long time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is simply a question as to the facts about this matter, and I was a little curious to know the source of these circulars that have been sent to individual Members of Congress urging great appropriations, and I wondered whether it was for some outside purpose by persons who were interested.

Mr. GRAFF. I have no doubt the people of Honolulu are interested, outside of the sugar interests, very largely in cultivating their city as a great naval and commercial port. It would be natural for them to take a very deep interest in this great project.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that the people of the entire Pacific coast are greatly interested in having Pearl Harbor properly protected with fortifications, and I dare say that all the commercial organizations of the coast have sent out memorials for the purpose of asking that that work be done.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That possibly is true, because I have received several. I was only anxious to know whether a city was to be built in the immediate vicinity. I was anxious to know whether they sent out the circulars to further that, or whether it was a purely patriotic purpose of theirs.

Mr. GRAFF. Possibly a patriotic purpose, and patriotism is a species of selfishness as well as heroism, for that matter.

Now, with reference to the Hawaiian Islands, we have provided for the defense of Honolulu with 14-inch guns at Waikiki. It was first proposed by the officials of the War Department that these batteries should be located immediately at Honolulu; but it was found afterwards, according to their opinion, that Waikiki would be the better point for the protection of Honolulu. They propose to have rapid-fire guns at Honolulu Harbor. In addition to that, we provide for fortifications at Diamond Head. On the extreme east is a promontory which stands out and past which most incoming vessels sail.

Mr. KEIFER. How far from the channel?

Mr. MURDOCK. How far is Diamond Head from the channel?

Mr. GRAFF. I should say Diamond Head was about 4 miles.

Mr. KEIFER. Twelve.

Mr. GRAFF. It is pretty difficult to judge. Those of you who have had any experience of a mountain country know how hard it is to calculate with the eye. You have got to have information. But we know this, that in the maps which were given us in the hearings showing the fire range, that it is proposed to reach and cover the entire harbor of Honolulu by this system of fortifications which they propose to establish.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not that indicate that the distance from Diamond Head to the harbor is less than that?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes; I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. About 6 miles in a direct line from the mortar batteries at Diamond Head to the outer line of the harbor.

Mr. GRAFF. I will state some facts that were interesting to me in connection with an improvement, which is an instance of the constant revolution that has been going on with reference to our coast defenses in invention, and which is a splendid indorsement of reasonable progress only in the completion of the work. That is the change of the 12-inch gun, which for years has been supposed to be the very acme of perfection as an instrument of war in coast defense. The War Department discovered that you can not fire a 12-inch gun more than fifty or sixty times without such erosion under the high pressure as to render it useless.

Mr. KAHN. Seventy rounds is the limit.

Mr. GRAFF. Theoretically they can fire a charge every half minute; so you can see that the life of a gun, if worked to its full theoretical capacity, is reduced to perhaps half an hour.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What size gun have they substituted for the 12-inch?

Mr. GRAFF. They have substituted a 14-inch gun, and the theory is not that they propose to produce results at a greater distance, but that they propose to produce the same effective results at the same maximum distance, without destroying the life of the gun in a brief half hour.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it the intention to have a slower velocity?

Mr. GRAFF. A slower velocity and a heavier projectile.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Army have reversed that condition in this, that they used to have .45 to .50 caliber guns in small arms——

Mr. KEIFER. Fifty-eight.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman from Ohio says up to .58, and now they have reduced the caliber to .30. It seems that the Army and Navy do not agree at all.

Mr. GRAFF. Possibly they have in view the accomplishment of different things.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The end to be produced is the destruction of life and property.

Mr. GRAFF. There are a lot of things to be taken into consideration in determining the kind of small arms to be used that would not have any bearing on the question of determining the proper guns for fortifications.

Our latest 12-inch coast-defense gun has an initial velocity of 2,550 feet per second and a muzzle energy of 47,299-foot tons. With this energy the 12-inch armor of the latest type of battle ship can be penetrated with normal impact at 8,700 yards and the 7-inch armor at all fighting ranges. But in developing this energy the high temperatures due to smokeless powder and the great increase in the volume of gas produce an erosion which materially shortens the life of the gun. There is little to warrant the hope that any material improvement will be speedily effected in the manufacture of either steel for gun construction or in powder to overcome this erosion.

Of that I am not so sure as General Crozier, who is probably the author of that statement.

It is considered unwise to tax the 12-inch gun to such an extent as the high velocity entails for the protection of the wide channels that exist at the entrances to Long Island Sound, Chesapeake Bay, Puget Sound, and Manila, if by increasing the caliber of the gun an equal or greater fire effect can be secured by employing a diminished velocity, which will not sensibly impair the life of the gun. Such an increase in the caliber means a large increase in weight of gun and carriage, a consideration of little moment in land defense, but prohibitive for use on battle ships.

The 12-inch gun can now fire two aimed shots in less than a minute, manual labor being used for loading and operating the gun and carriage. It is believed that this rate will not be materially diminished if the 14-inch gun mounted on a disappearing carriage of the same type as that now employed for the 12-inch gun, loaded and operated by the same means, be adopted.

Now, I may say, as a feature of this constant change, that there appeared in the hearings a new device for the elevation of the ammunition—in place of raising by hand and climbing up stairways, as is now done—which new device will wonderfully increase the rapidity of fire. While it is a compliment to men engaged in this science, it is also to me wonderfully forceful, not to proceed too fast with reference to this matter.

Now, we will proceed with reference to the Philippine Islands. Gentlemen will remember that last year there was a very sharp contest over the question whether we should have Subig Bay as a naval base, or whether we should not; and a floating dock was taken over there and excited the interest of the world, as everything on the sea seems to do, and it finally arrived there. Then it was determined, after a consideration of the question between the War Department and the Navy Department, that Subig Bay after all was not desirable as a naval base for obvious reasons—mainly because of its being impracticable to defend the bay from the land side.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAFF. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Neither the gentleman from Illinois nor I are experts.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not assume to be.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not my friend think that the experts could have discovered that Subig Bay could not be defended from the land side before we spent millions of dollars over there?

Mr. GRAFF. Oh, we have lost no money over there.

Mr. BUTLER. Where do they propose to take the dry dock?

Mr. GRAFF. Into Manila Bay, after there has been a proper excavation and improvement of that bay, as I understand.

Mr. BUTLER. How long will it take to excavate for it and how much will it cost?

Mr. GRAFF. Well, I have already enlarged the field of my remarks and I do not believe that I had better enter into that unknown subject.

Mr. BUTLER. If my friend will permit me to make the statement, I think it is pretty well understood by novices like myself that there is no place where the dock can be taken except where it is, and as far as I am concerned there it will stay.

Mr. GRAFF. Whether that be true or not, the fortification bill nor the Committee on Appropriations has nothing to do with the dry dock and nothing to do with the decision where the fortifications are to be placed. I am simply relating facts, and I relate them without any particular reflection on anyone. Whenever I come in contact with the men from the Navy or the War Department, I am impressed with their devotion to the cause and their great ability.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAFF. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not very necessary that the dry dock should be defended, and is it not necessary that it should be defended by fortifications?

Mr. GRAFF. Further operations at Subig Bay have been suspended, except that appropriation is made in this bill for the completion of the battery already installed there, which is retained for the strategic purpose of preventing a hostile fleet from entering Subig Bay and occupying it as a base of operations.

Mr. BUTLER. How much money did the committee appropriate for the defense of Subig Bay last year?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, in the first place no money has ever been appropriated specifically for Subig Bay. Money has been allotted, and that has not been wasted, whether the naval station be moved from there or not. Subig Bay is a great harbor, and it would be a harbor of refuge for a foreign fleet. It is essential, whether it be our navy-yard or not, that to some extent the entrance should be defended against a foreign nation using it as a harbor of refuge, and every particle of money that has been spent at Subig Bay has been well spent, even though it should be abandoned.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman from Iowa know how much money has been spent?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do know how much the appropriations were out of which the allotments were made. There have been no specific appropriations for that place.

The entire original plan for the fortification of Subig Bay was for two 10-inch guns, four 6-inch guns, and eight 3-inch guns. I do not regard a 3-inch gun as a great gun, and consequently the total plan of the Taft board was for six guns and not for a hundred great guns at Subig Bay.

Mr. BUTLER. When was that estimate made for a number of guns to be mounted there?

Mr. PARSONS. This is in the hearings of this year.

Mr. SHERLEY. Nineteen hundred and six.

Mr. BUTLER. Were those guns mounted in 1907 and 1908?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not all of them. I said before that every gun mounted there, or contemplated there, is essential whether a naval station is maintained or not.

Mr. GRAFF. These guns were maintained there for the essential purpose of protecting the harbor from a hostile fleet getting in there and occupying it as their own base.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Just as Dewey actually did before the battle of Manila.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes; just as Dewey did. Now, then, there remains to say what is intended to be done for the harbor at Manila, which is the point where the balance of the appropriation for the Philippine Islands is to go. There are four islands situated at the entrance to Manila Bay. One is Corregidor, which is the largest of the group.

Then there is one just adjoining Corregidor, called Caballo; then there is another island on the southerly side of the entrance to Manila Bay, corresponding in position on that side to Corregidor on the northern side, which is called Carabao; then, on the inner circle, there is a similar island, called El Fraile. In pursuance of the plan which we had adopted this year, it was for us to determine how far these units should progress. It was found, according to the testimony of the War Department officials, that beside Corregidor, where the fortifications had been practically completed, there remains a corresponding island on the other side of the entrance to Manila Bay—the island of Carabao—so that we made appropriations for the completion of the fortifications of Carabao, thus having those two islands, Corregidor and Carabao, commanding the entrance to the bay on each side and at a distance of 7 miles apart, within gun range; and we postponed the fortification of the two remaining islands of El Fraile and Caballo until a subsequent time.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to inquire the number of guns and their caliber mounted at these two islands.

Mr. GRAFF. I might say while the gentleman is looking up that information that El Fraile is an island very much in embryo and that the important thing that has to be done before emplacements are built on El Fraile is the making of it into an island, an artificial island practically, which has to be constructed there at a depth of water of over 100 feet, and involving an expenditure for building the island alone of something like $2,500,000 or $3,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask the gentleman when the authorities decided it was better to spend the money for fortifying Manila Bay rather than Subig Bay, how recently.

Mr. GRAFF. Very recently.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I can not help taking a certain amount of personal pleasure in that, as I remember standing here, I think, with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and a few others last year and voting against any appropriation for fortifying Subig Bay.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It would seem to me that the showing this year is that the defense of Subig Bay is just as essential whether it is a naval station or not, and that would relieve the gentleman from part of the gratification that he has felt.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not on the ground that some appropriation should be expended at Subig Bay, but that it should be expended entirely at the expense of fortifying Manila.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There was never any such proposition pending in the House. The proposition was to prevent the fortification of Subig Bay out of any appropriation.

Mr. PARSONS. Now that the change of naval base has been made from Subig Bay to Manila Bay, what increase in the amount of fortifications does the committee provide for Manila Bay over what had been intended when Subig Bay was to be the base?

Mr. GRAFF. None whatever. It is proposed to make these four islands right in the mouth of Manila Bay a Gibraltar, where the sovereignty of the United States could stay if somebody else had the balance of the archipelago.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A question. I understand that for the time being two islands only are to be fortified—that is, in Manila Bay—and they are about 7 miles apart. I suppose there will be a port regulation requiring all hostile boats to enter the harbor between those two islands?

Mr. GRAFF. No order will be necessary, as they can not go behind them, because the batteries will command both sides of each island.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I did not understand their location exactly.

Mr. GRAFF. The two islands fortified are comparatively close to the shore on either side.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is it necessary, then, to fortify the other two islands?

Mr. GRAFF. It is necessary, as it seems, because it draws the possible channel there into a narrow compass, and each of these two islands stand out in the entrance a little farther.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It makes a system of double fortifications.

Mr. GRAFF. A system of double fortifications. As I remember, they are a little farther in the channel than the islands which we propose to fortify now.

Mr. BUTLER. In the hearings, was any estimate submitted as to the cost of the land defenses at Manila?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There are no land defenses in Manila at all, in the sense of being on the main island.

Mr. BUTLER. Then it is concluded by the authorities that Manila is not in danger of attack from the land side.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Seacoast fortifications are not considered as affording protection against the assaults of armies.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the gentleman; his answer is plain; but as you propose to move from Subig Bay because it can not be defended from the land, I suppose you may——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I intended to fully answer the gentleman——

Mr. BUTLER. Inasmuch as it has been determined that Subig Bay can not be properly defended from the land, I assume some land defense will be needed at Manila.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman will delay his request until the conclusion of my colleague's remarks, I will answer the gentleman fully. I do not like to interrupt my colleague continually.

Mr. KAHN. These two islands command the entire entrance on both sides.

Mr. GRAFF. On both sides; and they are within fair range of each other, constituting a complete defense from the entrance by water into Manila Bay.

Mr. KAHN. That is my recollection of the lay of the land.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, in furtherance of my statement of the relations which exist between the fortifications of our country and the Navy, I desire to read, in conclusion, a portion of the message of the President of the United States, to which I have heretofore referred:

> It is an accepted naval maxim that a navy can be used to strategic advantage only when acting on the offensive, and it can be free to so operate only after our coast defense is reasonably secure and so recognized by the country. It was due to the securely defended condition of the Japanese ports that the Japanese fleet was free to seek out and watch its proper objective—the Russian fleet—without fear of interruption or recall to guard its home ports against raids by the Vladivostok squadron. This, one of the most valuable lessons in the late war in the East, is worthy of serious consideration by our country, with its extensive coast lines, its many important harbors, and its many wealthy manufacturing coast cities.

I thank you, gentlemen, for your attention. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will give an answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], if he now desires to put his question.

Mr. BUTLER. I will postpone my inquiry until the gentleman is through. We can have his answer under the five-minute rule, when I will repeat my question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will take pleasure then in trying to answer the question. I will now ask the gentleman from Kentucky to use such portion of his time as he may desire.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it would seem almost superfluous, after the very elaborate statement made by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF], that I, a new member of the subcommittee on fortifications, should undertake to speak to the bill, and yet it may be that there are some matters that with profit can be again referred to, and in particular it may be worth while to call to the attention of the country as well as to this committee the extent of the bill and the reasons that actuated the committee in so framing it. The report of the committee discloses that with estimates amounting to $38,443,945.36, the bill as reported carries only $8,210,611.

That shows a very great discrepancy between the view of the committee and the sum total of the estimates sent to that committee by the Department of War.

It is proper that some reason be given for that difference, and it is particularly proper that a correction should be made as to the motives that actuate the committee. It so happens that a newspaper of my city, the Louisville Herald, has editorially referred to the action of the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

> CONGRESS AND COAST PROTECTION.
> "In time of peace prepare for war" is an old maxim that despite its age has not lost aught of its wisdom. The truth of it has been demonstrated time and time again by history, and never more clearly than in the recent controversy between Japan and Russia. The former country displayed the advantage that belongs to foresight; the latter manifested the awful weakness that is the inevitable consequence of neglect.
> But the solons of Congress do not believe in the proverb; at least we are forced to this conclusion by the action of the House Committee on Appropriations in its treatment of the recommendations of War Secretary Taft concerning coast fortifications. A sum of $38,000,000 was asked by the Secretary for this work. Strong representations were made in his report as to the need for extensive operations to insure the safety of our Pacific coast in particular. The President sustained these representations in one of his messages, but the committee has struck $30,000,000 off the amount asked for, and allowed merely the remaining $8,000,000.
> The excuse advanced for this parsimonious treatment of the War Department is the alleged fear that Japan would regard any great activity in the construction of coast fortifications as a menace to the amity existing between her and this nation, and war might ensue as a consequence.
> To us the excuse seems extraordinarily inadequate, and even puerile. It is well known that our Pacific coast has long been left without the care and provision that a wise Government should afford to the vast industries and interests under its administration. The condition is one that makes our policy of neglect a subject for ridicule in the eyes of other countries. A man does not necessarily offer an affront to his neighbors because he repairs his fences, puts blinds on his windows, or sees that the locks on his doors are in good shape. Nor is it reasonable that a country should invite suspicion from other nations merely because it takes the necessary precautions to safeguard its own shores.
> The Japanese policy in such matters has never considered the susceptibilities of other lands. Japan's vigorous use of opportunities to make itself solid in Manchuria does not evidence any particular delicacy in this direction. The Japanese do these things politely, but with a firm hand. They will not expose their little island empire to possible onslaught simply because some other country might regard the protecting of its shores as an invitation to attack. If attack is a possibility, it would seem that the wise thing is to get ready.
> The United States does not cover itself with glory or add to the respect in which it is held by neighbor nations by showing so great deference to Japan. Let us by all means be friendly, but do not let us carry friendship to the silly extreme of leaving our doors and windows open to the burglar for fear some honest man might feel hurt.
> Congress should restore the full appropriation. As it is now, the greater part of the $8,000,000 is to be devoted to the protection of the Philippines and Hawaii. Surely if the excuse of the committee for cutting out the $30,000,000 is valid, it applies even more strongly to these points, so vulnerable from a Japanese basis, than to our continental coast.

Now, this would not be worthy of notice if it appeared as an editorial in a newspaper given to sensational writing; but it does not. It comes from a newspaper that ordinarily is accurate, and usually conservative. And similar views have appeared in other papers from time to time. It seems proper, therefore, to say that the Committee on Appropriations have, in making the total of this bill, had in mind simply the needs of the country as indicated by the officials of the War Department. We have made no appropriation for fortifications out of fear of any country, and we have failed to make no appropriation for fortifications out of fear of any country. The Congress of the United States of America is not given to legislating from such a motive. We shall provide for such fortifications as, in the opinion of the experts charged with that work, are necessary for the defense of the country, doing it without regard to any particular nation and with absolute confidence that such action by our Government ought not and will not be misunderstood by any nation.

Had we departed from the custom that the Congress has pursued in the past and increased our appropriation from a normal sum to $38,000,000, it might have been construed as an evidence on our part of the fear that there was to be a difficulty or war with some nation. Such a fear exists in the mind of no well-informed man, certainly exists in the mind of no Member of Congress, and the committee has simply presented a bill that represents, what to their mind, is a proper expenditure to be made at this time and which is in accord largely with the recommendations made by the Department.

As pointed out by my colleague [Mr. GRAFF], the present system of coast defenses dates from the creation of what is generally known as the "Endicott board," a board created by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1885, and which made its report the following year, enumerating the principles on which a system of coast defenses should be based, and outlining in detail the defenses contemplated. In pursuance with this report, as modified from time to time, appropriations were made until the report of what is known as the "Taft board," a board created by order of the President in January of 1905, and which report was filed in February of the following year, and superseded the Endicott report.

The appropriations for the twenty fiscal years 1889–1908 aggregate $109,513,748.72, or an average of $5,475,687.43 per annum.

Of the whole sum, $109,513,748.72, appropriated by the fortification acts covering the twenty fiscal years 1889–1908, the sum of $87,024,524.22 was appropriated in the twelve fortification acts enacted by the last six Congresses.

The fortification appropriation acts enacted during the Fifty-fifth Congress appropriated $14,287,396, in addition to which amount sums aggregating $8,674,898 were provided in deficiency appropriation acts for fortifications and the armament thereof, and the further sum of $12,865,840.60 was allotted for the same objects from the general appropriation of $50,000,000 made for the national defense in the act of March 9, 1898, making in all $35,828,134.60 available for fortifications and the armament thereof under appropriations made during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The total appropriations made for fortifications and other works of defense since 1888, and since the recommendations of the Endicott board of 1885, including the appropriations made in deficiency acts and allotments made from the national-defense fund, amount to $131,054,487.32.

The scheme of seacoast fortifications contemplated by the Endicott board, and which has been followed by Congress in the appropriations made since 1888, it is now estimated will cost in the aggregate $99,392,222, of which sum there has been already provided $64,800,042.24, the Engineer Department having received $28,693,434.02 and the Ordnance Department $36,106,608.22.

The difference between the sum, $64,800,042.24, already provided toward the scheme of the Endicott board and the sum total of appropriations, $131,054,487.32, for fortifications since 1888 is represented in expenditures for erecting and equipping the gun factory at Watervliet, the gun carriage factory at Watertown, the Ordnance and Fortification Board, purchase of land for fortification sites, torpedoes for harbor defense, providing ammunition for service and for tests, manufacture of field guns, fortifications in the insular possessions, and for sundry other objects incident to providing and maintaining a system of seacoast defenses.

From this statement of the appropriations heretofore made for seacoast defense, it is apparent that Congress has pursued a conservative and consistent course from the beginning, and that this is the only justifiable course becomes apparent upon even a slight study of the subject. It is evident that in making these appropriations we should be very much more deliberate than we might be in regard to matters where the money was to be expended along absolute, certain lines. For if there is any science that is progressing rapidly it is the science of seacoast defense. What yesterday was an improved, up-to-date method of defense is to-day antiquated, and what to-day we look upon as perfection will to-morrow be confined to the limbo of things that were. Now, this has its disadvantages, but no man would for a moment have it otherwise. It is to the everlasting credit of the Army of America that the officers in charge of this work of fortification have been men who have not only kept abreast of the times, but have gone out into the domain of experimentation and, as a result, have continuously developed new and more efficient means of fortification.

For instance, the development of the fire control of our guns has added two or three fold to the efficiency of those guns. Under the plans as originally contemplated by the Endicott board we would have had to erect batteries with armor protection, because at that time the disappearing carriage was unknown. Then there came the lift, by which these great guns were lifted, as an elevator might be, from the hidden plane to above the parapet, so as to be able to be used. In place of that we have now the modern disappearing carriage. These changes show that it is proper, not that we should neglect the real needs of the country, but that we should not hastily spend the money of the country on fortifications, but should proceed along a general plan that will give a proper defense to the country and at the same time will enable us from time to time, without undue expense, to take advantage of the improvements that occur in such defense. Now, that of itself would be a justification for the size of this bill; but I desire in referring to this article and the attitude that seems to prevail amongst a great many people unfamiliar with conditions to call attention to another fact.

The Congress of the United States is charged with the duty of making appropriations, a fact that is very frequently overlooked in criticisms of the Congress. We are constantly being told that we failed to do what the Executive told us to do, as if that was a crime in itself. Now, it is the duty of the Executive to advise Congress, but his duty ends there, and it is our duty, that we can not shirk, to exercise our sound discretion as to the extent of appropriations that shall be made. The safeguard of the people has always been the power of the legislative branch over the purse strings of the nation, and it will be an evil day when Congress, instead of exercising its discretion, blindly follows the Executive, no matter who he may be.

Another curious thing is, that while Congress is now always blamed for not going as fast as the Executive asks us to go in the way of appropriations, on the other hand Congress is always blamed for any extravagance that may exist. If we dared to follow the recommendations of all the Bureaus of this country, as sanctioned by the Executive, you would have an annual budget that would startle the people, and the blame would not be put upon the Executive and the officers under him, but upon Congress for that extravagance.

Now, it is perfectly natural that there should be a conflict between the legislative and the executive branches of the Government. Men in the Departments who are worth their salt have a zeal for their work that makes them desire to enlarge it, that makes them magnify its importance and necessity, and this magnifying of it brings as a result very large estimates for appropriations. On the other hand, Congress, dealing not with one Department, not having the zeal of a special advocate, but dealing with all the Departments, learns to be skeptical, to be critical, and to cut the estimates of the various Departments; and it is a proper attitude, one that should not be subject to censure and to criticism, but to praise by the people of the country; and the Committee on Appropriations in reducing this bill from $35,000,000 to $8,000,000 have done, not an unwise, but a very wise thing.

Now, the article proceeds on the assumption that the Pacific coast to-day is very inadequately fortified, a statement altogether foreign to the facts. There are but four points upon the Pacific coast which under either the Endicott or Taft scheme of fortification will be fortified. They are Puget Sound, Columbia River, San Francisco, and San Diego, the latter of which need not now be considered, because until the deepening of that harbor it would be impossible for any large ships of war to enter there.

We have provided in this bill for additional fortifications of Puget Sound. We have made such provision as will carry out the desires of the Department as to that point at this time. Columbia River is to-day well fortified. San Francisco, with the appropriations heretofore expended and those authorized, is well fortified; and instead of the Pacific slope being in a condition of absolute unpreparedness, the Pacific coast to-day is in the position of being extremely well fortified.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, have you seen an article by a Member of the House published in a magazine, entitled "Government," upon the matter of the inadequate defenses of Puget Sound?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Well, Mr. Chairman, my colleague from the State of Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] wrote the article, and I would like to say that I only read it on the train, but without refreshing my memory, it was with reference to the defense of Puget Sound especially. His statement is that Puget Sound is 7 miles wide, that it has great depth at all points, and that the fortifications there, in his judgment, are almost ridiculous.

Mr. SHERLEY. Without undertaking to go into a detailed description of the existing and proposed fortifications, against the statement of our colleague, I desire to put the opinion of the War Department. In their judgment it is not in a ridiculously poorly fortified condition; and if that were true, with the provision made for the fortification of Deception Pass, Puget Sound will be well fortified.

We have not only provided for the fortification of Puget Sound, and the other points as noted being in a condition of proper fortification, but we have made provision for submarine mines and made provision for an additional torpedo planter, so that in case of necessity these mines may be planted with great rapidity.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This article, in that regard, says that the tide and currents in Puget Sound render the use of submarine mines absolutely impossible.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is probably true at certain places, and especially true of Deception Pass. Deception Pass now has, during high and low tide, a current which will not only prevent the planting of mines, but also prevent the movement of ships. So that the only time there would be danger of the pass being used would be flood tide, when there would be no current to contend with. The statement as to any particular place I am not claiming as accurate upon my judgment, but upon that of the officers who appeared before the committee.

Now, as I have stated, we have provided for this additional torpedo planter, and the history of modern warfare shows that mine defense is a very great defense. It is a great defense not only in its actual effectiveness when tried, but in the moral effect that it has upon the foe. An opposing fleet is not going to hastily and thoughtlessly enter a harbor that is properly and scientifically mined according to the modern process.

The committee have, as usual, followed the custom of making appropriations of lump sums without a designation of places. In doing that I think the committee has given expression, perhaps, to a fad of some of the officers of the Department.

I am thoroughly convinced of the need of giving some discretion to the Department, so that it may adapt the moneys appropriated to the needs of the country as they appear from time to time. But I have no faith in that theory that there is any wonderful mystery connected with the fortifications of America or of any other country that requires absolute secrecy. There was a time when I thought I would have been guilty of treason if I had mentioned the fact that certain guns that were to be put at a particular point were going to be 12-inch guns instead of 6-inch guns; but I have discovered that all that I have learned as a member of this committee, and infinitely more than I know or can hope to know, is to be had without the least trouble, and is printed and probably in the possession of every foreign nation on this globe; and most of our talk about secrecy in connection with the fortifications of America is mere nonsense.

I hope to see the time come when the estimates made up by the War Department in regard to the fortifications of this country will be made so in detail that we will know absolutely at what particular point the money is expected to be expended, the purpose for which it is intended, and just the condition which that particular unit of defense is in.

Mr. MURDOCK. Right on that point $38,000,000 was asked. Is that right?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. And $8,000,000 was granted?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Can you enumerate to the House what the $30,000,000 which was denied omits?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is illustrating the fact that it is very much easier to ask a question than to answer it.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is right along the line on which you were speaking then—about the lump sums.

Mr. SHERLEY. I doubt if I can answer the gentleman's question in a running speech. If the gentleman will look at the recapitulation contained in the report of the committee, he will find what the estimates asked for, and then the amount recommended in the bill. Of course that will not show in detail just what is excluded, and in point of fact there is nothing to show, except by a very careful study of the hearings, what a given sum is to be expended for. You would have to infer by reading the hearings what was in the minds of the committee; but the sums actually appropriated in the important cases do indicate by the amount just what was in contemplation. For instance, we have made an appropriation in regard to the Pacific coast that indicates very clearly to the War Department that it was in the mind of the committee that certain fortifications at Puget Sound should be made out of this appropriation, and there are other sums that indicate that it was intended that moneys should be expended at certain places.

Now, the committee did not report an appropriation that contemplated the expenditure of any great amount upon the Atlantic or Gulf coasts, and that was because of a desire upon the part of the committee to balance the conditions of fortifications in the country at large. I believe it to be the view of the committee also that we should in the future (and that has been the policy in the preparation of this bill) complete units as far as possible as we go along. To illustrate, there was a condition in this country at one time when appropriations for ordnance were greatly in excess of the appropriations for emplacements. These come under different bureaus of the War Department, and one of the Chinese puzzles that confronts a new member of the Committee on Fortifications is to determine what particular bureau of the Government has to do with what particular part of the fortifications, and it is by no means a simple problem.

If the gentleman will look at the hearings at the bottom of page 4, he will see that what is termed the "emplacement"—that is, the concrete construction or furnishing of the platform for the guns, the parapets protecting the guns and the magazines, and so forth—is under the control of the Engineering Corps. The guns and mortars are constructed by the Ordnance Department, and they provide the ammunition. The Quartermaster's Department supplies the quarters for the garrison; the Signal Corps supplies the information equipment, such as cables, the wiring, telephone instruments, and things used in connection with transmitting the information needed for fire control. The engineers build the fire-control structures, and so forth, and then the Artillery Corps actually man and operate the guns.

Now, as I stated, there was a period when the appropriation for emplacements was very much behind that for ordnance. Where such a condition or a similar one exists the committee has tried to bring up the one behind so as to balance the other, and has endeavored in this bill to make proper appropriation for perfecting what might be called the incidentals of the unit. For instance, the two fundamental and expensive items in connection with the battery is the emplacement and the gun. In modern warfare there is, as a necessary part of these units, a very elaborate system of fire control.

There is also needed a power plant for the creation of power for the use of these batteries. The committee has therefore tried to bring these details to a point where we might have effective use of all the guns that are now mounted and properly mount and equip those where work had already been started.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the committee assure us that it has provided in this bill enough to provide all the accessories needed for the guns that have been mounted?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I would not be willing to make that statement in behalf of the committee, because at a number of points we have a temporary fire-control system that, while it would be adequate and efficient in time of war, is not the system that is contemplated to be there permanently, the difference being not so much in effectiveness of control as in the exposure of some of the wires and cables that control communications from points of observation to the gun.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman say, then, that the committee has provided accessories for the guns that have been mounted, either of a permanent or temporary nature, so that all the guns mounted can be effectively used when the appropriation is expended?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the fact as I understand it. In those cases where there is now an efficient fire-control system we have not always authorized the installation of permanent systems, but we have authorized it wherever it was necessary in order to use the guns and in the new authorization for emplacements and guns we have provided sufficient funds to have that part of the fire-control system that ought to be installed, during the building of the foundation of the gun, authorized so such work could proceed along with the other.

We have also endeavored to appropriate sufficient sums for the purchase and installation of the most-needed searchlights.

Now, in regard to the possessions lying outside of the United States, the committee has seen fit to appropriate practically for the Hawaiian Islands and for the Philippines only. Nothing is provided for Guam, nothing for Cuba, and nothing for any other outlying possessions. At the Hawaiian Islands provision has been made for the completion of all the fortifications contemplated there, except those in connection with Pearl Harbor and a few of the smaller guns.

In regard to Pearl Harbor there was no difference of opinion on the part of the members of the committee. All of us were a unit in believing that the Hawaiian Islands are the great vantage point for the control of the Pacific and for the protection of the Pacific seacoast of America. We are anxious to proceed in the further fortification of those islands whenever conditions as the result of legislation by Congress are such as will warrant us in so proceeding. But your committee would have been subject to a just criticism if it had brought in an appropriation for the placing of certain batteries at the entrance of Pearl Harbor when that harbor was in the condition that it is now in. It is known to all who have been there or investigated it that it is impossible to carry into that harbor ships of any great size, and that is true not simply owing to the depth of the water, but from the tortuous character of the channel. It is the duty of Congress, as the result of the suggestion of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to determine whether it wants to make a naval base and station of Pearl Harbor. Until Congress has so acted, there is absolutely no reason why this committee should authorize the appropriation looking to the fortification of Pearl Harbor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman two or three questions about this matter.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many different committees would have to agree upon a programme in order to deepen that channel and make this a naval base and fortify Pearl Harbor so as to make it what it promises to be, a second Gibraltar? How many committees have charge of the various matters that enter into that?

Mr. SHERLEY. In my judgment, the reporting of a bill authorizing the deepening and straightening of the channel and the making of a naval base out of Pearl Harbor lies within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that committee only. The question of fortifications lies with the committee on fortifications of the Appropriations Committee, so that my answer is those two committees.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That being the case, why do not those two committees get together and agree on one programme, so that we can get through with the thing and fix it as everybody that thinks about it wants it fixed.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will think for just a moment, he will realize that there is no need for the committees to get together. The duty of the Fortifications Committee is not to suggest to this House or to anybody what points shall be used as naval bases. The duty of the Fortifications Committee is to provide appropriations for the fortifying of such harbors and naval bases as in the judgment of experts of the War Department ought to be fortified. Now, for us to indicate that there should be created a naval base there or elsewhere would be to extend our jurisdiction far beyond its legitimate scope.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then this delay, as I understand it, is to be charged up to the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman has spoken most accurately.

Mr. PARSONS. May I ask whether the fortifications of Pearl Harbor have not some relation to the protection of Honolulu?

Mr. SHERLEY. So slight that if there was not to be a naval station there we would not be warranted in spending anything of an extensive nature for fortifications at Pearl Harbor.

Mr. PARSONS. May I ask the gentleman to explain just what the scheme of fortification defense for Honolulu is?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will try and give the gentleman the information. The programme for fortifications, as outlined by the Taft board contemplates two 14-inch guns, two 12-inch guns, four 3-inch guns, and sixteen 12-inch mortars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That does not state that a modified plan was agreed upon when Colonel Story was sent around the world to investigate the insular possessions, and on his report they have eliminated the 12-inch guns.

Mr. SHERLEY. The statement as made is accurate as to what the Taft board has recommended, but I have no doubt that my colleague is correct in saying that has been modified to the extent of the elimination of the two 12-inch guns.

Mr. PARSONS. Whereabouts are those guns to be placed?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can perhaps answer what the gentleman desires to know by saying that most of the mortars were intended for Pearl Harbor, as I understood it. Some of the mortars are at Diamond Head and the other mortars are to be at the entrance to Pearl Harbor.

Mr. PARSONS. Is that so they may aid in the protection of Honolulu?

Mr. SHERLEY. They are to aid somewhat, it is supposed, in the protection of Honolulu, but chiefly in the protection of Pearl Harbor itself. It is true that it is estimated by some of the war officers that there is a line at which fire from the guns that are placed near Honolulu and at Diamond Head and the mortars from the entrance to Pearl Harbor would cross. At least the field of these batteries would overlap at one point where ships attacking Honolulu could come. I think that is correct.

Mr. PARSONS. May I ask this: Unless you have the mortars at Pearl Harbor, could not ships come near enough to Honolulu to bombard it?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not.

Mr. NORRIS. This present bill does not provide for any mortars at Pearl Harbor.

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not.

Mr. NORRIS. That part of the Taft programme for Honolulu is not carried out in this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not carried out, and for the reasons that I have tried to make plain.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I understand the reasons.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman's statement is a little misleading. That part of the programme of the Taft board did not contemplate the protection of Honolulu so much as it contemplated the protection of this naval base that was to be created by straightening out of the channel that leads into Pearl Harbor.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand. I think the gentleman's statement might be a little misleading, because I think we might have understood from his remarks that these mortars were to be placed there and were provided for in this bill. I did not think that was so, and I did not think he wanted to convey that idea.

Mr. SHERLEY. My impression is that the authorizations heretofore carried and those contemplated in this bill provide for all of the fortifications for the Hawaiian Islands, other than the mortars contemplated to be placed at the entrance to Pearl Harbor.

Mr. NORRIS. If I might suggest to the gentleman, it would give the membership valuable information if the gentleman would give the distance between Diamond Head, where the mortars on one side are to be placed, and Pearl Harbor on the other.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will appreciate I can not carry those distances in my head. I should say that Diamond Head was about 3 miles or a little more from Honolulu and the entrance to Pearl Harbor is about 6 miles from Honolulu, but an air line from Diamond Head to the entrance of Pearl Harbor would not be the distance of the 6 and 3 miles, because the three points form somewhat of a triangle.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I beg the gentleman's pardon, did he say the distance from Honolulu to Diamond Head was 3 miles?

Mr. SHERLEY. Something over 3 miles.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In an air line; oh, it is a good deal further than that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman will find it is not very much greater than 3 miles.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is about 5 miles.

Mr. GRAFF. If the gentleman will permit, I remember the maps which were presented to the committee showed the fire range intersecting at a point on the west side of Honolulu; in other words, on the side next to Pearl Harbor, so that would indicate very clearly Diamond Head was closer to Honolulu than Pearl Harbor was.

Mr. NORRIS. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will let me suggest, Diamond Head is not a very great distance from Waikiki and other places which extend up the coast, and when you come to the entrance and wharfage of Honolulu it is quite a good deal of distance, I should say 4 or 5 miles.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have just been informed by the Delegate from the Hawaian Islands the distance from the mortars to Honolulu is about 4 miles, and I have no doubt his statement is more accurate than my memory.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, do you say battle ships can not go to Pearl Harbor to-day?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do. I know it not only as a result of the statement of the War Department, but from the fact of having come out of that harbor myself on a very small craft, and if you could have seen the difficulty in the turning and twisting to get that small boat out, you would not have very much doubt about a battle ship coming in.

In regard to the Philippine Islands, the committee has made appropriations looking to the complete fortification of an additional island at the mouth of Manila Bay. No appropriation is suggested for the purpose of any expenditure in Subig Bay, for after a great amount of debate in previous years, and hard feelings and hard names and tremendous conflict of two great arms of the service, it is fortunate that the committee is able to say that without loss of life one of these arms have retreated, and Subig Bay has now under the original scheme been abandoned, we may hope forever.

So that the committee has made appropriations looking to the fortifications of Manila Harbor only. There are contemplated in the final fortifications of that harbor the establishment of batteries upon four islands. One of these is now practically completed, and this bill carries an authorization for the complete fortification upon Cariboa Island. Corregidor is now practically completed according to the original plan for that fortification. As to El Fraile and Caballo, no appropriation for fortifications is made.

I had hoped to present to the Committee of the Whole a statement as to the total expenditures heretofore made and carried in this bill for the Philippine Islands. There is a statement, as set out in the report of the committee, showing that up to this time there have been appropriated for the insular possessions the sum of $4,894,860, but I have been unable to give to the committee a statement in detail of what has been expended or authorized to be expended in the Philippines as separate from the other insular possessions, and my failure to give this information is but another reason why I hope at the presentation of this bill next year the committee will have been put into possession of such data as will enable it to give to the membership of this House detailed information in regard to the fortifications everywhere.

At present it is almost impossible, as the estimates are made, to determine just what proportion of various sums are to be used at different places and for certain objects. That can only be arrived at from a detailed cross-examination of the different officers having charge of the expenditures. It would be exceedingly simple to have the various bureaus of the War Department—the Engineer Corps, the Artillery Corps, the Signal Service Corps—cooperate in presenting to the committee, and through it to Congress, a detailed statement, so that it will be possible for us to know just what percentage of the work at any particular fortification was finished and what was still needed. The following statements show the scheme of fortification for the Pacific coast and for the insular possessions, viz:

In addition to these larger items that I have just mentioned, an examination of the recapitulation of the bill found in the report will show a number of minor items of interest and importance. The committee has endeavored, as stated, to provide a sufficient fund for the purchase and installation of searchlights at certain harbors, notably those on the Pacific coast. There has also been provision made for the manufacture and purchase of machine and automatic guns and equipment, mountain, field, and siege cannon and equipment, etc., and ammunition for machine guns and cannon.

In addition to the provision made for an additional torpedo planter upon the Pacific coast, an item is carried for a torpedo planter for the Hawaiian Islands, and an item also covering the purchase and installation of searchlights there and in the Philippines.

Without further burdening the committee with a recital of the details of these items I subjoin herewith the recapitulation of this bill. An examination of this recapitulation, together with statements touching the fortifications erected and to be erected in the United States and the insular possessions, will, to the careful student, convey an accurate impression of the effect this bill will have if enacted into law.

I desire in concluding this very desultory statement, which I feel has been most inadequate, owing somewhat to the technical nature of the subject, to call attention to what the costs of these fortifications are going to be to America—not in the creation, but in the manning of them. I desire to read from the report of the Chief of Artillery for 1907, touching the personnel of the corps, the following, viz:

The act of January 25, 1907, provided an increase of 5,043 enlisted men in the Coast Artillery. Of this increase 4,970 men were for the purpose of providing one complete manning detail for all mines, searchlights, and power plants to be operated in connection with the defense of all fortified harbors of the United States now completed or under construction. Deducting this 4,970 from the authorized maximum enlisted strength, 19,321, there remains 14,351 authorized by law for manning all guns now mounted in the fortifications of the entire country. These guns, however, actually require 36,863 men for one complete detail, so that the maximum number of men now authorized for gun defense is 4,080 short of one-half of one complete manning detail for the guns already mounted in the United States.

In addition, 330 men will be required for the operation of the mines, searchlights, and power plants and 5,546 men for the gun defenses of the United States projected by the National Coast Defense Board, making a total of 47,709 enlisted men required for the defenses of the United States alone as now completed and projected. For the defenses of the insular possessions and of the Panama Canal, as projected by the National Coast Defense Board, there will be required 1,270 men for the operation of mines, searchlights, and power plants and 6,131 men for the gun defenses, a total of 7,401 men. It is thus seen that 55,110 men are required for one complete manning detail for all our defenses as completed and projected.

Now, this is an accurate statement, and I know it came as a distinct shock to me—and I am sure it will to quite a number of others—that, upon the final completion of all the fortifications proposed for continental America and for the insular possessions, it will require this army of some 55,000 men to properly man these guns, and that number simply providing one shift for twenty-four hours of duty a day. In other words, assuming that it will cost $1,000 per man, which, I think, can be taken as a minimum expenditure for the cost of a soldier during a year, the manning by corps that will have no relief of all the fortifications of the United States and the insular possessions would require an annual expenditure of $55,000,000. Now, that is a sum large enough to make us all pause in consideration of the tremendous expenditures that modern civilization, in spite of its civilization, forces upon nations for the barbarous purpose of war. It is another reason why we should be slow in the appropriations, and should not, out of a false fear, amplify these batteries that are necessary for the coast defense. Of course they should be ample, but with such tremendous expenditure, both in their creation and in their maintenance afterwards, they should not be more than ample.

I had hoped also to present a statement that would show something of the cost of other military operations by this Government. We have had from time to time general statements made, but unfortunately by virtue of our system of legislation there is never presented to the people of America, as there should be, at each session of Congress, a budget that will give to them a view of the total expenditures of their Government. I am thoroughly satisfied that if the people of America could know and be familiar with what is expended by the Congress and for what purposes that we would hear very much less of clamor such as contained in the editorial I refer to about the estimates being cut, and a good deal more praise of Congress for exercising a sound discretion in those expenditures. [Applause.] It is unfortunate that there is no committee of the House charged with the duty of supervising in its entirety the expenditures of Congress. It is even more unfortunate that there occurs no debate in the Congress of the United States looking to a discussion of the budget. The English system in that regard, and the system of continental countries, is infinitely superior to ours.

If the time that we waste here at the beginning of each new Congress, wondering, speculating, and scheming as to what committees we will be assigned to by the Speaker and the minority leader, could be expended in an intelligent discussion of the budget for the current year, not only would the Members obtain a familiarity with the workings of the Government, but the country would have an object lesson exceedingly valuable. Instead of that, we simply have brought in by the Committee on Military Affairs a bill that we are assured by that committee is a conservative and proper bill; and the Committee on Naval Affairs brings in a bill with a similar assurance; and the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads brings in another, the Committee on Foreign Affairs another, and the Appropriations Committee brings in several others. But there is nothing to show the relative sum appropriated for war as against peace pursuits; nothing to show the cost of maintaining the very Departments of the country. So that it requires long service in the House and intricate study to arrive at anything like a comprehensive appreciation of what is annually expended by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. May I ask why that does not fall within the province of the Committee on Ways and Means, and why it has never been done? What does the Committee on Ways and Means mean if it does not mean a budget?

Mr. SHERLEY. Really, the Committee on Ways and Means has been a puzzle to quite a number of us as to what its duties are, because we have been unable to get any action out of it; but, seriously speaking, it seems to me it is beyond the present jurisdiction of that committee. That committee's duty is to provide the revenues of the country, but it is not now contemplated it should supervise the expenditures. Of course, there ought to be a cooperation and understanding between the committees that raise revenue and the committees that expend them, and at one time the Ways and Means Committee did both. The ideal government, as I pointed out here several years ago, is a government that fits its income to its necessary, economic expenditures. With that sort of scientific government you would do away with all your balance in the Treasury, you would do away with the need of an argument against the lending of the people's money without interest; you would do away with the constant temptation toward extravagance by virtue of a large surplus that you want to get rid of.

In other words, you would be running the Government's business upon the same theory that any business man would run his. But, unfortunately, the rules of the House do not permit that practice to be invoked.

Mr. KAHN. Under the system the gentleman proposes, would it not be practically necessary for some committee of the House to be appointed almost at the beginning of the term of office, when there was no Speaker to appoint such a committee, in order that in the interim that might intervene between the day of beginning the term and the meeting of Congress that committee could hear the various officials of the Government in order to get information upon these various subjects?

Mr. SHERLEY. I believe the same thing would be possible by the Executive and the members of his Cabinet presenting to Congress not simply the estimates that are presented now by the Secretary of the Treasury, but really a budget in the true sense of the term. Then the country could understand that the Administration in power stood by that budget that was offered to Congress. It would be the business of the majority Members of the legislative branch to defend that budget; it would be the proper and legitimate business of the minority Members to attack that budget, and out of that defense and attack would come a real understanding of the expenditures.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman if the real difficulty about having somebody come in here and develop the budget does not grow out of the fact that we have no minister of the Government, as they are called in Europe, who has a seat in either House of Congress, and the reason they can be questioned this way in European parliamentary bodies is because the ministers must have seats in the parliamentary bodies where you can get at them and question them at short range?

Mr. KAHN. Interpellate them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Interpellate.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no doubt that is one of the reasons. Still, I do not think the absence of a seat upon the floor of the House by members of the Cabinet constitutes an insurmountable difficulty to the carrying out of this idea.

I have been led in the discussion of this bill somewhat afield from the subject of fortifications, and I beg to thank the committee most kindly for its attention while I have been addressing it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman will yield, there are two gentlemen present to whom I desire to yield a little time. I now yield to my colleague [Mr. BIRDSALL].

Mr. BIRDSALL. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill appropriates in round numbers $1,200,000 for the fortification of the Philippine Islands, and I assume that further appropriations will hereafter be made for the same purpose. I am in favor of this action on the part of the committee and any other reasonable action on the part of Congress looking to the better fortifications of our island possessions. I deem it a proper time to discuss our policy, present and future, in the Philippines and rise to call the attention of the House to the joint resolution introduced by myself early in the session declaring it to be settled policy of the United States to grant independence to the people of the Philippines under our sovereignty as soon as they are capable of self-government.

The question of our national policy in the Philippines remains one of absolute interest. Criticism of the Administration is not wanting by those who from motives of political consideration or from genuine alarm view our policy there as one of imperialism.

Viewed from the broader standpoint of history and philanthropy, the acquisition by the United States of a vast territory in the Orient and the assumption of the burden of civilizing nearly 9,000,000 of semicivilized people is but a scene in the play which has been enacted for the past four centuries and but a factor in that modern civilization which had its birth in the Reformation and has spread throughout the world.

We Americans are not isolated from this current of modern civilization and are but one of the many agencies selected in the providence of God, to carry the light and civilization of the Western World into the night of the mystic East. Shall we prove equal to the task and acquit ourselves in such manner that the future historian will write our advent there as a date for rejoicing or for regret?

With the close of the Spanish war the last vestige of Latin supremacy disappeared from the Western Hemisphere forever, and by the treaty of Paris Spain also surrendered the Philippine Archipelago, over whose savage and semicivilized people she had ruled with brute force for four hundred years. Her history in both hemispheres is written in blood, sealed with the mailed hand of persecution and relieved by the sunlight of scarcely a single act done for civilization and progress. The history of Spain and its sequel, however, carries for us and all other nations a lesson of force and instructive wisdom. Philip the Second wrote himself "King of all the Spanish Kingdoms and of both the Sicilies; titular King of England, France, and Jerusalem; absolute dominator in Asia, Africa, and America; Duke of Milan and of both Burgundies, and hereditary sovereign of the seventeen Netherlands." The ruler over lands upon which the sun never ceased to shine.

One by one shorn of her dependencies and provinces, her ancient glory has departed, and the last act by which her remaining islands of the sea were transferred to Germany, her ancient enemy, was a fitting finale to a tragedy lasting through four centuries of misrule and incompetency, and the little peninsula, impoverished and broken by internal strife and dissension, remains now the sole heritage of the infant descendant of the Cæsars.

Mindful of the lessons of history, realizing the importance of the step we were about to take, the obligation we were about to assume, and that our conduct would be adjudged impartially in future ages, William McKinley laid down a rule of conduct that appeals to the enlightened sentiment of the twentieth century when he announced:

The Philippines are ours not to exploit, but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government. This is the path of duty which we must follow or be recreant to a mighty trust committed to us. The question is not will it pay, but rather will we do what is right?

The people of the archipelago, wanting in knowledge of the history, capacity, and intention of their new governors, might well look with caution and reflect upon the consequences of a change in masters brought about as the issue of a bloody war. The corner stone of every government rests upon the belief of security in life and of property under its dominion, and the basis for government in the Philippines must rest in a belief in the minds of the Filipinos that our declared policy would be carried out; that it was intended to benefit them and not ourselves alone. Confidence in our good intentions was the basic stone upon which the structure of our civil government in the islands was founded and upon which it must be maintained. The native must be taught to understand and believe that he is building for himself and not for our aggrandizement. It was necessary in order to create this belief that the animosities engendered by the war should be overcome, that suspicion of our purpose should be allayed, that they should be instructed in our history and gain a better knowledge of our policies and people. It was no easy matter to impress upon the minds of a people whose intercourse with the Western World for centuries has been that of the victim to the robber, that they would fare better at the hands of those who had despoiled the despoiler. Likewise, it is no easy task to remove from their minds the prejudices which everywhere exist among the Orientals against the Western World.

Let us consider from an impartial and unprejudiced standpoint what has been wrought in the few brief years of American sovereignty in the islands. Civil government dates from the appointment by President McKinley, March, 1900, of the Taft Philippine Commission, consisting of Hon. William H. Taft, of Ohio; Prof. Dean C. Worcester, of Michigan; Hon. Luke Wright, of Tennessee; Hon. Henry C. Ide, of Vermont, and Prof. Bernard Moses, of California. The Commission was nonpartisan in its character and its general purpose, as stated by the President, was to continue and perfect the work of organizing and establishing civil government already commenced by the military authorities, subject in all respects to any laws which Congress may hereafter enact.

Instructions for the guidance of the Commission were prepared by Hon. Elihu Root, as Secretary of War, and this state paper has been appropriately styled the "Magna Charta" of the Filipinos. It became the organic law of the Philippine Archipelago, and under it the civic machinery for 8,000,000 people has been worked out. Legislative authority was conferred upon the Commission as follows:

The making of rules and orders having the effect of law for the raising of revenue by taxes; customs and duties and imports; the appropriation and expenditures of public funds of the islands; the establishment of an educational system throughout the islands; the establishment of a system to secure and effect an efficient civil service; the organization and establishment of courts; the organization and establishment of municipal and departmental governments, and all other matters of a civil nature for which the military governor is now able to provide by rules or orders of a legislative character.

It can be said to the credit of the Commission that not one of the legislative acts has failed to meet the approval of Congress, though they number into the hundreds and cover every phase of civil government touching the liberty of the citizen and the security of his property rights. The sessions of the Commission were public and freely attended by the people of the islands. Hearings were given upon bills of a public nature and the views of the natives freely expressed and duly considered. On June 21, 1901, the executive branch of the government was transferred from the military governor to the president of the Philippine Commission, and on July 4, 1901, Hon. William H. Taft, the present Secretary of War, was inaugurated civil governor.

On September 1, 1901, separate executive departments were created, to which members of the Commission were assigned. These departments consisted of a department of the interior, of commerce and police, of finance and justice, and of the public instruction, and at the same time, by appointment of the President, three Filipinos were added to the Commission. By appropriate legislation the Commission provided for municipal governments throughout the islands, created a judicial system under which the civil courts assumed jurisdiction, created an insular constabulary and municipal police, enacted and put into operation a successful civil-service law and a system of account and credit. A system of education was adopted and installed. Forestry laws and extensive system of public improvements were adopted and entered upon and adequate means of securing revenue by duties and taxes were devised and put in force.

The Fifty-seventh Congress placed the seal of governmental approval upon the organization that had been perfected and conferred every act of the Commission and conferred upon such government additional authority.

In fact, in pursuance of the policy outlined by President McKinley, rights and powers were granted to the Philippine government greater than those possessed by any other country subject to our sovereignty or ever possessed by the States constituting the Union. They were authorized to impose in time of peace tariff duties upon goods coming from ports of the States of the Union into ports of the Philippine Islands. Congress conveyed to the government of the islands all the public property in the archipelago which had passed under the treaty of Paris from the Crown of Spain to the United States, including public buildings, streets, parks, highways, the mineral wealth, beds of streams, and the great forests of valuable woods. It also authorized the government of the Philippine Islands to issue its own currency and direct its postal service. No integral or segregated portion of the United States, foreign or domestic, is exercising to-day so many of the attributes of sovereignty as the Philippine Islands.

The legislative power is now vested in a legislature composed of the Commission and the Philippines assembly—the latter house elected by the inhabitants of the islands. The census completed by the War Department gave us for the first time reliable data as to the numbers and distribution of the population. Heretofore the only information on the subject was derived from Spanish censuses, which were little more than estimates on the subject. According to the American census, the total population is 7,635,426, of which number 647,740 are classified as wild and uncivilized, though not without some knowledge of the domestic arts. The most populous island is Luzon, with 3,798,507 inhabitants, of whom 223,506 are uncivilized. Panay has 743,646 inhabitants, of whom 14,933 are uncivilized. Cebu has 592,247 inhabitants, all civilized. Mindanao's population is 499,634, the uncivilized numbering 252,940, or more than one-half. Jolo has 44,718 inhabitants, of whom only 1,270 are classified as civilized; the province of Cottabato, 125,875 people, of whom only 2,313 are civilized. The population of Manila, the largest city in the archipelago, is stated at 219,028. At the present time the powers of the judicial branch of the government are exercised by a supreme court composed of seven members appointed by the President, three of whom are natives of the islands. Courts of the first instance and inferior courts are appointed by the Commission. Of the courts of the first instance, fifteen are American and six are native, while the minor courts nearly all are native. The municipal governments and provincial governments are administered by officials selected by the popular vote of the inhabitants. The municipal divisions compare with the towns of New England and townships in other portions of the United States and constitute the political units. These municipalities are organized under a general municipal code which provides for the election of a president, vice-president, and municipal council chosen by the qualified electors of the municipality. All male persons above 23 years of age having a legal residence in the municipality for six months and who are not the subjects of any foreign power and who are comprised in one of the three following classes shall be permitted to vote for municipal officers:

First. Those who, prior to August 13, 1898, held the office of municipal captain, alcalde, lieutenant, or member of any * * *.

Second. Those who own real property to the value of 500 pesos or who annually pay 30 pesos or more of the established taxes.

Third. Those who speak, read, and write the English or Spanish language.

There are at the present time 982 mayors of municipalities, 2,906 secretaries, treasurers, etc., and 8,159 counselors, all of whom are Filipinos. The Commission in its report to Congress are able to say that the judges of the various courts, both American and native, have performed their duties in a satisfactory manner and that justice is administered evenly, uniformly, honestly, expeditiously, and ably throughout the islands. The application of our American system of jurisprudence, the code of procedure fashioned therefrom, which has eliminated the technicalities and delays which prevailed under the Spanish system, has been a great benefit to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, and it is evident that an abiding conviction is being brought home to them that in the courts is to be found safe and reliable protection against all unjust invasion of the rights of person or property. Since government exists for the purpose of compelling us to keep the peace, to settle our disputes by arbitration instead of blows, confidence in the capacity and integrity of the courts is a prime essential to civilized government, and reverence for and submission to them an unfailing index that a people are civilizing themselves.

That the Philippine government should not be made the subject of the spoils system, one of the first laws enacted provided for a system of civil service, which has been extended to substantially all the positions in the executive branch, subordinates in the clerical force of the judicial branch of the service and practically all positions except elective offices. The United States civil-service rules have been amended so as to permit the transfer thereto of any person who has served in a competitive position in the civil service of three years or more. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, in May, 1902, referred to the civil service instituted in the Philippines as follows:

It is hard to see how our government of the Philippines could be started upon its path in any better way than by the excellent provisions established by the Philippine Commission. The reflex action upon our Government of the establishment of a complete merit system in the Philippine Islands can hardly fail to be beneficial. The example of good methods successfully administered, even in a possession as distant as the Philippines, is sure to beget good results when contrasted with the inefficiency and corruption that flowed from the remnants of the spoils system here at home. It will be remembered that England first tried competitive methods in her Indian possessions before she established her civil-service system at home, and it was the successful working of this commission in India which led to its adoption in England. It may not be improper to repeat here the opinion expressed on a former occasion, that inasmuch as the beginning of this reform came from Calcutta to London, it is not impossible or unreasonable to expect that its perfect consummation may come from Manila to Washington.

The Commission have pursued the policy of employing in the government service the Filipino whenever and wherever he demonstrated capacity for the duty required, with the result that the civil service of the entire country is now practically in the hands of the natives.

It is gratifying to find that less than 10 per cent of the government employees and municipal officers are Americans, and that of the police and constabulary force over 98 per cent are Filipinos.

The newest report of the Secretary of War shows that the total number of schools in operation during the last year was: Primary schools, 3,435; intermediate schools, 162; trades schools, 32; agricultural schools, 5; domestic science schools, 17; and provisional high schools, 36—a total of 3,687.

As hereinbefore stated, a complete currency system has been inaugurated in the Philippines, affording a fixed medium of exchange, and which does away with the fluctuation of value incident to the old régime. Their coins have a fixed convertible value to the United States currency in the ratio of 2 to 1. A gold reserve is maintained for the purpose of securing and preserving this parity. Post-offices have been established throughout the entire archipelago, and the facilities include the issuance of money orders. Free-delivery service exists in the city of Manila, the entire force of letter carriers being natives. Nine thousand four hundred and forty-one miles of telegraph and cable lines are in operation throughout the islands. The new Pacific cable has been in operation since July 4, 1904.

The Philippine government is authorized to levy its own taxes and disburse its own revenues, and all of the expenses of the administration of the government have been met by the revenues of the islands.

The receipts and expenses of the government since American occupation are shown by the following table:

Total		13,500,000

Of this total bonded indebtedness, $7,000,000 was incurred for the purchase of the friar lands, and a considerable amount was created by the establishment of the coinage system. For the first they have the lands acquired by purchase from the friars and for the second a substantial asset in gold. The net charge for interest upon the customs revenues of the islands is less than 2½ per cent.

The present per capita debt of the Philippines is less than that of the United States or Great Britain, being in the former $12 and in the latter $90 per capita.

The progress in the material as well as intellectual welfare of the islands has been marvelous. In fact, all the aid to comfort, health, enlightenment, and civilization that modern science and humanity have invented has been installed in the islands. Already the archipelago has felt the impulse of our Western energy in its people and its commerce.

Reliable data fix the total value of the export and import trade of the islands during the Spanish régime at $35,000,000 annually. Since the American occupation they have continually increased until the annual commerce is over $50,000,000.

The principal item of export is manila hemp, and two-thirds of it comes to the United States.

The enlargement of our commercial relations, business ties, and the community of interest thereby engendered will aid much in the development of the Philippines along the lines of civilization and progress if the proper spirit shall be manifested by our commercial agencies.

We ought not to forget that the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are our wards, to the uplifting of whom we should apply the most generous treatment which statesmanship can invent. We must cement them to us not only by wise political action, but by a generous commercial policy having their interests first at heart. Such, I am happy to say, has been the wise policy and conduct of our civil governors and Commissioners in the past; such should it continue to be until the bonds of affection and interest alike unite them indissolubly to us.

We can find little to condemn and much to praise in the conduct of our legislative and executive officers in promoting locally the welfare of the Filipino, but what have we done in our home legislation to merit approval? We have denied them our Constitution while insisting upon their fealty to our flag. Of this the Filipinos have no just cause of complaint if our ultimate policy is to give them independence, but it operates to spur their ambition to a speedier acquisition of that desired object. The oriental mind is nowhere prepared for self-government at the present time, though the spirit of constitutional government is rife in Japan. The power of governing has so long borne the stamp of divine right in the oriental world that the one-man power is the only intelligible authority. We have sought to impress upon the Filipino that his ultimate independence rested in proof of a capacity of self-government, which must come from the development of the individual alone. As a dominant country it is our duty to do everything in our power to diffuse correct opinions and dispel errors respecting our political relations with them and to avoid creating an error on this subject. Unless we are prepared to concede their independence we ought to discourage such pretensions on their part.

It is no genuine concession to grant to a dependency the names and forms and machinery of popular institutions, unless the dominant country will permit those institutions to bear the meaning which they possess in an independent community, nor do such apparent concessions produce any benefit to the dependency; but, on the contrary, they sow seeds of political dissention and perhaps insurrection and wars, which would not arise otherwise.

Suspicion of our ultimate purpose to grant independence has been fostered by refusal of our home Government to admit the products of Filipino labor into our markets upon equal terms with those of our other dependencies. Philanthropy should rise above the sordid influences of commercial life, and, unfettered by local interests, legislate from the standpoint of colonial interests alone. Unfortunately, at present, home politics govern, to a great extent, our intercolonial relations, and we are asking ourselves the question, "Will it pay?" rather than, "Is it right?"

No one candidly thinks or honestly believes that the introduction of sugar and tobacco free of duty from the Philippines would have any more serious effect here than the slight reduction in the dividends of wealthy corporations, yet the corporations are with us and influential in politics, while the Filipino is 15,000 miles away and has only the righteousness of his cause to plead for him.

One man has consistently and constantly pleaded for fair treatment of our island wards, asking that the products referred to be admitted for at least 25 per cent of the rates now provided by the Dingley bill. So far his efforts to impress Congress with the justness of his plea have been unavailing. Of one thing I am reasonably certain, that rightly understood by the consumer and the American people at large the policy of Secretary Taft will meet with general approval.

Another evidence of the influence of home politics and of inconsistency in legislation is shown in the bill that applies the United States coastwise law to trade between the Philippines and the United States after July 1, 1905. This bill was reported to the House and passed in April, 1904. As reported it provided—

That on and after July 1, 1905, no merchandise, except supplies for the Army and Navy, shall be transported by sea, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, directly or by way of foreign port, or for any part of the voyage, in any other vessel than a vessel of the United States. That on or after July 1, 1905, no foreign vessel shall transport passengers between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, either directly or by way of foreign port, under a penalty of $200 for each passenger so transported and landed.

This gave the American ships an absolute monopoly upon all traffic between the United States and the archipelago after July 1, 1905.

This legislation came at the behest, practically at the demand, of the shipping industry, and whatever may be its effect upon shipping monopolies at home, it can but prove detrimental to the commerce of the archipelago with this country and lays a cruel burden upon the Filipino in the way of advanced freight rates already very burdensome. It is not a little remarkable that we should reproduce in this century the English navigation act of 1561.

In commenting on the character of this legislation in the House of Representatives, I took occasion to say:

But however American industries may be affected by the intended legislation, we believe the controlling question should be the consideration of the Philippines themselves. Anything else implies a cold-blooded indifference to their well-being and to their relation to our Government. Their productions being tropical, their development depends upon foreign trade. An increase in their production means an increase in surplus for exportation, for which we must take products of other countries. As we have already stated, nothing affects the course of foreign trade to increase or diminish its volume or change the course of its direction so much as the cost of transportation and exchange. If the transportation be increased to this country, it will tend strongly to repress the trade and discourage any American influence in developing the islands. The inevitable result, in our opinion, will be to confine their industries, and internal trade and foreign commerce as well, in the hands of Europeans, who virtually control them now.

We believe a broad and liberal policy should prevail; that commerce should be as free and unrestricted as possible between the islands and the United States, now the parent Government; that as soon as practicable the burdens of our tariff should be made as light as possible upon the products of the islands. Such a policy will, in our judgment, tend to the upbuilding of our dependency, to its advantage and our own benefit. It will tend to cement the bond which Governor Taft and the Commission have studiously cultivated. Any other policy, and especially such as is contemplated in this bill, will amount to a sacrifice of duty toward our helpless dependency.

This act has been so amended as to make the law apply to the Philippines after July 1, 1910. It should be repealed entirely.

It is now becoming more apparent every day that the Government of the United States should recognize and, so far as possible, adopt a settled policy regarding our future intention toward the Philippines. We should ultimately give them independence and in the meantime most generous treatment. We have not compelled tribute as did Rome of her dependencies; we have not sought to tax them for our benefit; we ought not to seek to monopolize their trade as did Spain with all her colonies or suffer them to become the prey of commercial piracy, but rather let us remember the great trust we hold as set forth by McKinley and more tersely put in the phrase of Secretary Taft: "The Philippines for the Filipinos."

We shall meet with trials and perhaps disappointments, but, having assumed the "white man's burden," let us be true to the nobler instincts of humanity. Let us be patient, and when the time comes, as I firmly believe it will, when we can with honor and safety lay aside our burden, let it be with our task fully completed and with the confidence and affection of the Filipinos firmly established. Then will the history of our time contain no brighter page than the record of the construction of the Philippine State by the United States of America and running through it all will be reflected the genius of McKinley and the guiding hand of Taft. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HALE].

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to the bill (H. R. 17744), which I introduced on February 25, with reference to extending the benefits of the act of June 27, 1890, the act of May 9, 1900, and the act of February 6, 1907, to certain officers and enlisted men of the civil war, their widows and minor children. I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a memorandum from the Commissioner of Pensions relative to the six regiments and one independent company known as "The United States Volunteers."

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Memorandum for the Commissioner of Pensions relative to the six regiments and one independent company known as "The United States Volunteers."

The organizations known as "United States Volunteers" consisted of six regiments and one independent company. Enlisted men of those organizations were chiefly deserters and refugees from the Confederate army and prisoners of war who had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States. The commissioned officers were appointed chiefly from the Regular Army or from volunteer regiments in the service of the United States at the time the United States Volunteers were organized.

The United States Volunteers were organized and served as follows:

FIRST REGIMENT.

The members of this regiment were enrolled at Point Lookout, Md., on various dates from the month of January, 1864, to the month of June, 1864, and proceeded to Norfolk, Va., where the regiment was mustered in by companies, as follows: Companies A, B, C, D, E, F, and G, May 1, 1864; the field and staff, May 2, 1864; Companies H and I, June 6, 1864, and Company K, June 28, 1864. The regiment remained in or about Norfolk, Va., until August 15, 1864, principally doing provost duty. During the time they were stationed in Norfolk a portion of the regiment, consisting of Companies C, E, and H, participated in an expedition to Knotts Island, N. C., from June 14 to 18, 1864. From July 10 to 16, 1864, Companies C, D, H, and K were on an expedition to Suffolk, Va., and from July 27 to August 3, 1864, Companies B, C, D, E, and K were on an expedition to Elizabeth City, N. C. Those expeditions were undertaken for the purpose of capturing horses and cotton and dispersing bands of guerrillas at Knotts Island, Suffolk, and Elizabeth City. On August 15, 1864, the regiment left Norfolk, Va., the field and staff and six companies, B, C, D, E, H, and K, proceeding via New York to St. Louis, Mo., where they arrived August 22, 1864, and four companies, A, F, G, and I, going via New York to Milwaukee, Wis., where they aided from August 27, 1864, to about September 5, 1864, in the enforcement of the draft in Milwaukee. The six companies left St. Louis August 27, 1864, and the four companies left Milwaukee about September 5, 1864, and thereafter all the companies of the regiment served in the Department of the Northwest, the six companies serving in the district of Iowa and the four companies serving in the district of Minnesota. All of them were engaged while in the Department of the Northwest in garrison duty, in checking or suppressing Indian uprisings, and in guarding wagon trains and Government property, and were stationed at various points in Minnesota, Kansas, Dakota Territory, and Montana Territory, until finally mustered out of service at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., on various dates between November 27, 1865, and May 21, 1866.

SECOND REGIMENT.

The members of this regiment were enrolled on various dates in the month of October, 1864, at Rock Island, Ill., where the organization was mustered into service as follows: Company A, October 3, 1864; the field and staff and Companies B, C, D, E, F, and G, October 6, 1864, and Companies H, I, and K, October 13, 1864. The regiment remained at Rock Island until February 24, 1865, when ordered to Fort Leavenworth, Kans., where it arrived February 26, 1865. The regiment was immediately distributed to various points in the State of Kansas for garrison duty and was engaged either as companies or detachments in checking or suppressing Indian uprisings, guarding mail stages and Government trains, and performing garrison duty in that State until November 7, 1865, when mustered out of service at Fort Leavenworth.

THIRD REGIMENT.

The members of this regiment were enrolled on various dates, principally in the month of October, 1864, at Rock Island, Ill., where they were mustered into service as follows: Company A, October 13, 1864; Companies B and C, October 14, 1864; the field and staff and Company B, October 15, 1864; Company F, October 17, 1864; Company H and I, October 31, 1864; Company K by detachments October 13 and 14, 1864; Company E by detachments, October 15 and 17, 1864, and Company G by detachments, October 17 and 18, 1864.

The regiment remained at Rock Island until February 28, 1865, when it proceeded to Fort Kearney, Nebr. T., via Fort Leavenworth, arriving at Fort Kearney, April 8, 1865. Upon arrival at Fort Kearney the regiment was divided up into detachments consisting of about eleven men each and stationed at various points along the overland stage line in the Territories of Nebraska, Dakota, and Colorado. The various detachments were engaged in escorting wagon trains and coaches and in guarding the telegraph line and the property of citizens and of the Government until October 23, 1865, when ordered to Fort Leavenworth, where the regiment was mustered out of service November 29, 1865.

FOURTH REGIMENT.

The designation of this regiment, originally the Second United States Volunteers, was changed in orders dated March 30, 1865, to the Fourth United States Volunteers. The members of the regiment, with the exception of those of Company F, were enrolled during the month of October, 1864, at Point Lookout, Md., and immediately proceeded from that place to Norfolk, Va., where they were mustered into service October 31, 1864. The members of Company F were enrolled and mustered into service on various dates between June, 1863, and August, 1864, at Fort Delaware, Del., and at different points in the State of Pennsylvania as members of the Third Regiment Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery and the Fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry. They immediately joined those regiments in Virginia and served in the field in that State with the respective regiments mentioned until March 17, 1865, when they were transferred to the Fourth United States Volunteers and joined it at Norfolk, Va. All the members of the regiment after their arrival at Norfolk, Va., were engaged on provost duty in and about that city until April 30, 1865, when ordered to St. Louis, Mo. Upon the arrival of the regiment at St. Louis it was immediately ordered to Sioux City, Iowa, were it arrived May 27, 1865. The various companies of the regiment were then distributed to different points in Dakota Territory, where they were engaged in garrison duty, in guarding Government animals and other property at Indian agencies, and in checking and suppressing Indian uprisings until June, 1866, when ordered to Fort Leavenworth, Kans., where the regiment was mustered out of service on various dates from June 18, 1866, to July 2, 1866.

FIFTH REGIMENT.

The members of this regiment were enrolled on various dates from March 16, 1865, to April 21, 1865, at Alton, Ill., Camp Douglas, Ill., and Columbus, Ohio, and were mustered into service at Camp Douglas and Alton, the members of the company (E) enrolled at Columbus, Ohio, having been mustered into service at Alton. The dates of muster in as shown by the records are as follows: Field and staff and Companies A, B, and C, March 22, 1865; Company D, April 5, 1865; Companies F and G, April 6, 1865; Company H, April 14, 1865; Company I, April 15, 1865; Company K, April 18, 1865, and Company E, May 2, 1865. The regiment left Camp Douglas and Alton in May, 1865, for Fort Riley, Kans., where it arrived on or about June 1, 1865. Upon arrival at Fort Riley the regiment was separated into companies and detachments and stationed at various points in Kansas, Colorado Territory, Dakota Territory, New Mexico Territory, and Nebraska Territory, engaged in guarding the overland mail route, as escorts for parties opening wagon roads, in protecting settlers from Indians, in checking or suppressing Indian uprisings, and on garrison duty until mustered out of service on various dates from October 11, 1866, to November 13, 1866, at Fort Kearney, Nebraska Territory, and Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

SIXTH REGIMENT.

The members of this regiment were enrolled on various dates in March, 1865, at Columbus, Ohio; Camp Morton, Ind., and Chicago, Ill., and were mustered into service as follows: Companies A and B, March 16, 1865, at Columbus; Company C, March 22, 1865, at Camp Morton; Company D, March 24, 1865, at Camp Douglas; Company G, March 24, 1865, at Camp Morton; Company E, March 25, 1865, at Camp Douglas; Company F, March 26, 1865, at Camp Douglas, and Companies K, I, and H, April 2, 1865, at Camp Douglas. The companies at Camp Morton and Columbus immediately after muster in, joined those at Camp Douglas, and the regiment left that camp May 8, 1865, for Fort Leavenworth, Kans., where it arrived May 11, 1865. Immediately after arriving at Fort Leavenworth the regiment was separated into companies and detachments and stationed at various points in Kansas, Colorado, Utah, and Nebraska, performing post garrison duty, building forts, performing escort duty, and guarding the overland mail route and the Pacific telegraph line. The various companies continued on that duty until they were mustered out of service, on different dates from October 10, 1866, to November 3, 1866, at Fort Kearney, Nebraska Territory, and Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

FIRST INDEPENDENT COMPANY.

The members of this company were enlisted and mustered into service at Baltimore, Md.; New Haven, Conn., and Bridgeport, Conn., on various dates between May 7, 1863, and April 16, 1864, as members of Company G, First Connecticut Cavalry Volunteers, and served with that organization, which was in the field in Virginia, from some time between March 5 and 31, 1864 (exact date not shown by the records), until April 30, 1864. On the date last mentioned they were transferred to the Department of the Northwest, and served at various stations in Minnesota, doing garrison duty and checking and suppressing Indian uprisings, until mustered out, November 16, 1865, at Fort Snelling, Minn., the designation of the organization having been changed under orders dated March 24, 1865, to the First Independent Company United States Volunteers.

The organization of the Fourth Regiment was authorized in a letter from this Department to Major-General Butler dated December 22, 1864, in which it was stated that so soon as recruited the regiment would be reported to the Adjutant-General with view to its being ordered to the Northern frontier.

The organization of the Sixth Regiment was authorized in a letter from this Department to Maj. Gen. Joseph Hooker dated March 12, 1865, in which General Hooker was authorized to recruit a regiment of volunteer infantry from prisoners of war at prison depots within his department to serve for three years, or during the war, in the Northwest or on the plains.

Aside from the instructions relative to the organization of the Fourth and Sixth Regiments, nothing has been found of record to indicate that there was any authority for the establishment of the members of the United States Volunteers "for frontier service;" nor does it appear that there was any law then in force under which volunteers could have been called, enlisted, or accepted into the military service of the United States with any such limitation as to the place of service. Neither has anything been found of record to indicate that any of the members of the United States Volunteers were so enlisted or accepted into service except that it is stated on the prison records of the majority of those who were enlisted at Rock Island that they were enlisted "for frontier service." On the other hand, in a report dated September 16, 1864, Major-General Butler, who enlisted the members of, and who organized the First Regiment, stated that at the time of their enlistment "the promise was not even made to them that they should not be sent against their former friends, which propriety would suggest would not be best and which has not been done, they having, by order of the Lieutenant-General, been sent to the Northern frontier."

While it appears that authority was given for the organization of the Fourth Regiment, except Company F, and of the Sixth Regiment, with a view to their being ordered to the Northern frontier and to serve in the Northwest or on the plains, respectively, the legality of that authority is doubtful, and it does not appear from the records of those organizations, including the enlistment contracts of the members, that advantage was taken of the authority or that the members were enlisted with any restriction whatever as to place of service or as to the kind or character of service.

In the case of the First and Fifth Regiments, Company F of the Fourth Regiment and the First Independent Company, nothing whatever has been found to show that they were organized or that the members were enlisted with any restriction whatever as to place of service or as to the kind or character of military service to be performed. On the contrary, in the case of the First Regiment it appears that the promise was not even made to them that they would not be sent against the Confederates, although the regiment was sent, by direction of Lieutenant-General Grant, to the Department of the Northwest, where it replaced certain other troops sent from that department to General Sherman in Georgia.

In the case of the members of the Second and Third Regiments, it does not appear from the rolls or other records of those organizations, including the enlistment contracts of the members, that they were enlisted with any restriction whatever as to the place of service or as to kind or character of service, although it is stated on the prison records of the members of those organizations that they were enlisted for frontier service, except in the cases of the following-named members, concerning whom no such statement was made:

SECOND REGIMENT.

James M. Carter, Company B; Henry G. Chambless, unassigned; William Coleman, Company H; Richard Edgworth, Company H; Charles Hutchinson, unassigned; William Mahan (also borne as Mahon), Company C; Thomas Warren, unassigned; William M. Herron, Company B.

THIRD REGIMENT.

Thomas Harmon, Company E.

The Adjutant-General.

APRIL 19, 1907.

The foregoing was transmitted to this Bureau with the return of a call made in the case of Philip W. Arwood, private of Company D, Fourth United States Volunteer Infantry, certificate No. 738274, and with the following indorsement:

APRIL 19, 1907.

Respectfully returned to the Commissioner of Pensions, with a memorandum inclosed relative to the six regiments and one independent company known as the "United States Volunteers." This memorandum contains all the information shown by the records relative to the place of service of those organizations and to the enlistment of any of the members thereof for "frontier service."

F. C. AINSWORTH,
The Adjutant-General.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, May 18, 1907.

Maj. Gen. F. C. AINSWORTH,
The Adjutant-General.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Referring to your memorandum of April 19, 1907, furnished me relative to the six regiments and one independent company, known as United States Volunteers, I find on page 2 thereof the following:

SECOND REGIMENT.

The members of this regiment were enrolled on various dates in the month of October, 1864, at Rock Island, Ill., where the organization was mustered into service as follows: Company A, October 3, 1864; the field and staff, and Companies B, C, D, E, F, and G, October 6, 1864, and Companies H, I, and K, October 13, 1864. The regiment remained at Rock Island until February 24, 1865, when ordered to Fort Leavenworth, Kans., where it arrived February 26, 1865. The regiment was immediately distributed to various points in the State of Kansas for garrison duty and was engaged either as companies or detachments in checking or suppressing Indian uprisings, guarding mail stages and Government trains, and performing garrison duty in that State until November 7, 1865, when mustered out of service at Fort Leavenworth.

And on page 3 thereof the following:

FOURTH REGIMENT.

The designation of this regiment, originally the Second United States Volunteers, was changed in orders dated March 30, 1865, to the Fourth United States Volunteers. The members of the regiment, with the exception of those of Company F, were enrolled during the month of October, 1864, at Point Lookout, Md., and immediately proceeded from that place to Norfolk, Va., where they were mustered into service October 31, 1864. The members of Company F were enrolled and mustered into service on various dates between June, 1863, and August, 1864, at Fort Delaware, Del., and at different points in the State of Pennsylvania as members of the Third Regiment Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery and the Fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry. They immediately joined those regiments in Virginia and served in the field in that State with the respective regiments mentioned until March 17, 1865, when they were transferred to the Fourth United States Volunteers and joined it at Norfolk, Va. All the members of the regiment, after their arrival at Norfolk, Va., were engaged on provost duty in and about that city until April 30, 1865, when ordered to St. Louis Mo. Upon the arrival of the regiment at St. Louis it was immediately ordered to Sioux City, Iowa, where it arrived May 27, 1865. The various companies of the regiment were then distributed to different points in Dakota Territory where they were engaged in garrison duty, in guarding Government animals and other property, at Indian agencies, and in checking and suppressing Indian uprisings until June, 1866, when ordered to Fort Leavenworth, Kans., where the regiment was mustered out of service on various dates from June 18, 1866, to July 2, 1866.

It seems to me that they are somewhat contradictory in that it is stated therein that the members of the Second Regiment were enrolled on various dates in the month of October, 1864, at Rock Island, Ill., where the organization was mustered into service as stated, and that the designation of the Fourth Regiment, originally the Second Regiment, was changed in orders dated March 30, 1865, to the Fourth United States Volunteers; that the members of the regiment, with the exception of those of Company F, were enrolled during the month of October, 1864, at Point Lookout, Md., and immediately proceeded from that place to Norfolk, Va., etc.

I gather from the statement of the memorandum that the Second Regiment proceeded from Rock Island, Ill., to Fort Leavenworth, at which last place the regiment was distributed to various points on the frontier for garrison duty, etc.; and that the Second Regiment, afterwards designated as the Fourth Regiment, proceeded immediately from Point Lookout, Md., to Norfolk, Va., etc.

I will be pleased if you will look into the matter and advise me whether I misunderstand the memorandum, etc.

Very truly, yours,

V. WARNER,
Commissioner of Pensions.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 21, 1907.

Hon. VESPASIAN WARNER,
Commissioner of Pensions.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter of the 18th instant, relative to the memorandum of this office of April 19, 1907, in regard to the six regiments and one independent company, known as United States Volunteers, in which letter you suggest that the memorandum is somewhat contradictory in the description of the organization and movements of the Second and Fourth (also designated Second) regiments, I have the honor to inform you that there is no real contradiction in that statement, as suggested.

The apparent contradiction will disappear, I think, when you are advised that from October, 1864, to March 30, 1865, there were two separate and distinct regiments, designated as the Second United States Volunteers, one organized and stationed at Rock Island, Ill., until February 24, 1865, when ordered to Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and the other enrolled at Point Lookout, Md., and mustered into service and stationed at Norfolk, Va. The designation of the last-mentioned regiment was changed in orders dated March 30, 1865, from the Second United States Volunteers to the Fourth United States Volunteers.

Very respectfully,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
The Adjutant-General.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to make a similar request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks a similar privilege. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield such time to the gentleman from Georgia as he may desire.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, as is usual the general debate upon appropriation bills in this session has taken a wide range, and I hope I may be pardoned if I do not follow the debate to-day and discuss the bill.

I have been a Member of this House for thirteen years and more, and during all of that time I have listened, as my Democratic colleagues and the country have, to speeches of gentlemen on the other side, the burden of which has always been that whenever we had a Democratic administration and a Democratic tariff we had panics and when we had a Republican administration and Republican tariff we had prosperity. I confess that when I first made my advent in this House I saw gathered here in this Chamber more white Republicans than I ever saw at one time in a house before. [Laughter.] I was part of that flotsam and jetsam that was left in the great storm and wreck of 1894 which followed the "sound and sane" Administration of the then President. From that day to this, from that most severe Democratic rout until now, the Democratic party has been endeavoring to recover, and from that day to this present has gradually reduced that majority until now, I say to the Members of this House, unless all signs shall fail the people will return the control of the House and the Government to the Democratic party in November next. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

I have been in this long service particularly attracted by the fact that when the Republican party was in hard stress and in need it always called into action the doughty champion and eloquent statesman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

How often have we heard him "roll as a sweet morsel under his tongue" the statement that the ruin and panic of 1893–94 followed the enactment of the Gorman-Wilson bill, and how that in the time of "panic" we rushed through 650 amendments, under a rule giving only forty minutes' discussion before adopting them.

But how changed is his subject now. "The beauty of Israel is slain upon its high places. How are the mighty fallen." No more we hear from him or from any of the rest that panics follow Democratic success and no panics follow Republican success. It reminded me very much of a story I heard told of a gentleman who was out in the bay with his old negro fisherman, and night and storm came upon them, and after the storm had somewhat subsided and they desired to reach the shore, the master being tired lay down in the bow of the boat and said, "Sam, steer by that star and we will reach the shore safely." After a while the old negro came to him and shook him, and in great terror and trepidation said, "Massa, get up, the star has set. Give me another star to steer by." So hereafter the gentleman from Pennsylvania and gentlemen on that side will have to find another star. The Democratic panic star has set for good. [Applause on the Democratic side].

I recalled also, when the gentleman was making his speech and had, as I shall undertake to show, resurrected new doctrine for the Republican party, those verses from Butler when he said:

Thy trenchant blade, Toledo trusty,
For want of fighting has grown rusty,
And will eat into itself, for lack
Of something to hew and hack.

I think I might paraphrase that and say:

Thy trenchant panic blade, Oh, DALZELL trusty,
For want of Democratic panic will grow rusty,
And will eat into itself, for lack
Of Democratic panics to hew and hack.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman resurrected as his party founder and the author of his party faith Alexander Hamilton, a man who has been written of by a living Republican Senator, who said that the party which he (Hamilton) founded and of which he had been the chief and the champion when he died, sunk out of existence, and even its name was lost, except as a byword of political unpopularity. I am willing, Mr. Chairman, and the Democratic party and the people are willing that this new declaration of Republican faith, this resurrection of Hamiltonian theories, shall be placed before the country as the foundation upon which the present Republican party, deserting its cry of Democratic panics, shall build its theories of government and go before the people. I am content and the party that I belong to is content that the gentleman should so pick up and reclothe this skeleton of Federalism as represented by Hamilton and the theories he taught.

I have no words to say in disparagement of the great abilities of Mr. Hamilton. He was a wonderful man, but if he could have had his way we would have not had now a union of States separate in their powers and distinct in their duties and obligations and one General Government controlling national affairs, supreme within itself, and the independent States supreme within themselves. He was a lover of the strong government of England. In fact, he thought it the greatest government on the face of the earth, and in less than five years after we had achieved our independence from the tyrannies and oppressions of England and overthrown the forces of the King and the kingly power, when we came to frame the charter of our liberties, the Constitution, he did all he could to have the Government modeled after that of England. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention, presented his plan of government, advocated it in a masterful speech, and when they refused to go back to the kind of government from which they had just succeeded in freeing themselves he left the convention and did not return until a short while before it adjourned. If Hamilton could have had his way we would have had no Republic; we would have had an executive like the King, chosen for life, independent of the people.

We would have had States only in name, with their governors selected by the General Government and with the power to veto everything that the legislature of the States might do. Hamilton had no trust in the people. He did not believe that they were capable of self-government. If the Hamiltonian theory of government is to be the new Republicanism, I am content, and the Democratic party, I think, is content that the Republican party shall stand as the sponsor and exponent of his doctrine of the principles of government.

But I do not believe we have yet arrived at that stage of demoralization and distrust of republican institutions when we are ready to give up the theories of government for which our fathers fought, and which were finally established by the overthrow of Great Britain, and accept the theories of Hamilton in place of our republican form of government and the theories of Democratic rule taught by the author of the Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic party.

Since I have asserted that Hamilton was not in favor of a republican form of government such as was finally established, it is proper that I should make proof of that statement. I hold in my hand the proposition he submitted to the Federal Convention for the Constitution of the Government. It was a supreme legislative power in the first article, the one to be called "the assembly" and the other "the senate," which should frame the legislation of the nation with power to pass the laws. The assembly was to consist of persons elected by the people, and the senate elected by persons to serve during good behavior. It is bad enough sometimes to have a Senate with a chance to reelect it every six years, but what sort of a government would we have to-day if we had them elected during good behavior and only to be impeached by themselves?

These Senators shall hold place during good behavior, removable only by the impeachment for some crime or misdemeanor. They shall continue to exercise their office when impeached until convictions shall take place. In support of these propositions he said the form of the new government was to pervade the whole of the civic powers—in short, a complete sovereignty.

Since I have asserted that Mr. Hamilton was not in favor of a republican form of government, such as was finally established, it is proper that I should make proof of that statement. I take this from the Life of Hamilton, by Senator LODGE.

In the Federal Convention he submitted the following propositions for a Constitution of the Government:

I. The supreme legislative power of the United States of America to be vested in two distinct bodies of men, the one to be called the assembly, the other the senate, who together shall form the legislature of the United States, with power to pass all laws whatsoever, subject to the negative hereafter mentioned.

II. The assembly to consist of persons elected by the people, to serve for three years.

III. The senate to consist of persons elected to serve during good behavior.

ARTICLE III.

SEC. 1. The senate shall consist of persons to be chosen, except in the first instance, by electors elected for that purpose by the citizens and inhabitants of the several States comprehended in the Union, who shall have in their own right, or in the right of their wives, an estate in land for not less than life, or a term of years, whereof at the time of giving their votes there shall be at least fourteen years unexpired.

SEC. 6. The senators shall hold their places during good behavior, removable only by conviction, on impeachment for some crime or misdemeanor. They shall continue to exercise their offices when impeached until a conviction shall take place. * * *

All laws of particular States contrary to Constitution or laws of the United States to be utterly void; and the better to prevent such laws being passed the governor or president of each State shall be appointed by the General Government and shall have negative powers upon the laws about to be passed in the State in which he is governor or president.

In support of his proposition Mr. Hamilton advanced the following arguments:

Society naturally divides itself into two political divisions—the few and the many, who have distinct interests.

The aristocracy ought to be entirely separated; their power should be permanent, and they should have the caritas liberorum.

In my private opinion, I have no scruple in declaring, supported as I am by the opinion of so many of the wise and good, that the British Government is the best in the world; and that I doubt much whether anything short of it will do in America. I hope gentlemen of different opinions will bear with me in this, and beg them to recollect the change of opinion on this subject which has taken place, and is still going on. It was once thought that the power of Congress was amply sufficient to secure the end of their institution. The error was now seen by everyone. The Members most tenacious of republicanism are as loud as any in declaiming against the vices of democracy. This progress of the public mind leads me to anticipate the time when others as well as myself will join in the praise bestowed by Mr. Neckar on the British constitution, namely, that "it is the only government in the world which unites public strength with individual security." * * *

To the proper adjustment of it the British owe the excellence of their constitution. Their House of Lords is a most noble institution. Having nothing to hope for by a change, and a sufficient interest, by means of their property, in being faithful to the national interests, they form a pernicious barrier against every pernicious innovation, whether attempted on the part of the Crown or of the Commons. No temporary senate will have firmness enough to answer the purpose. * * *

As to the Executive, it seemed to be admitted that no good one could be established on republican principles. Was not this giving up the merits of the question; for can there be a good government without a good executive? The English model was the only good one on this subject. The hereditary interest of the King was so interwoven with that of the nation, and his personal emolument so great that he was placed above the danger of being corrupted from abroad, and, at the same time, was both sufficiently independent and sufficiently controlled to answer the purpose of the institution at home. * * *

Let one branch of legislature hold their places for life, or at least during good behavior. Let the Executive also be for life.

It may be truly said that of all the great Americans of the early day Alexander Hamilton was the least truly in sympathy with the cause of the colonies in 1776. He showed his monarchical tendencies in the Constitutional Convention by offering the plan I have called attention to, and in his speech, when he described the British Government as the best in the world and when he doubted whether anything short of it would be good for America. He distrusted the people, and insisted that our State government should be extinguished in order to establish what he called the success of our empire. His purposes were defeated. He was so disgusted that as late as 1802 he wrote to Gouverneur Morris that the government established by the Constitution was a weak and worthless fabric.

If these be the theories and principles of the Republican party to-day, which are to be resurrected and proclaimed as those that should be followed by them, and which the people should be asked to enjoy, I have no doubt of the result of the issue as between them and those other theories and principles of government which were taught by Jefferson and the founders of the Republic when submitted to a vote of the people. It is a bold and new step in the direction of centralization and federalism that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has proclaimed when he resurrected Hamilton and his theories as the principles of the Republican party, which are to guide them in this, the twentieth century, and which, if followed, must eventually destroy our form of government as it was established and was intended to exist. When Hamilton died, the party which he had organized and undertaken to establish had almost ceased to exist and soon after died, for, as Senator LODGE says in his Life of Hamilton:

> The party of which he had been the chief champion dropped out of existence, and even its name was lost except as a byword of political unpopularity.

The Democrats of this time and of all times in this country have always been content and will always be content to follow the founder of their party, Thomas Jefferson. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I were to make a comment just there?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. No; it would not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And that is that the course of recent events has been that while the British Government has become more democratic by constant pressure of the people for self-government, the Government of the United States, under the Republican programme, has constantly tended to become more centralized and monarchical.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I intended to say something with reference to that. They have in England a demand that the House of Lords shall be abolished, and we have somewhat the same demand in this country that our "House of Lords" shall be elected by the people, and while we have not a President for life, we have a President who, in my judgment, has sometimes disregarded the law and the Constitution.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Our "House of Lords" exercises often in this country the right to kill bills of the legislature of the people, which is something that is not exercised by the House of Lords in England.

Mr. BURLESON. They would not dare exercise it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Now, I have undertaken to epitomize the theories of the government of the founder of the Democratic party, whose party did not die with him—the principles of whose party did not die with him and have not become at any time a byword of political unpopularity.

Nor will the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania undertook to say that Jefferson is not entitled to the credit of the Louisiana purchase take away from him that credit, because I need but to state Republican authority to prove the assertion. Said Mr. Hoar:

> The mighty figure of Thomas Jefferson comes down in history with the Declaration of Independence in one hand and the title deed of Louisiana in the other, and the author of the Declaration of Independence in human history is the foremost man who ever lived whose influence has led men to govern themselves in the conduct of the state by spiritual law.

It must be remembered that we who believe in the teachings of the founder of the party need not adopt new principles or new theories. The gentleman from Pennsylvania quoted from Webster, and so will I. Said Webster:

> He is the author of the Declaration of Independence and the person who wrote the title deed to our liberties. It is the product of his mind, and the high honor of it belongs to him absolutely. * * *

As against the man who undertook to establish a monarchy and a President for life and a Senate for life, and governors of sovereign States chosen by the General Government, I place this statement with reference to the founder of our party, which Webster uttered, that all Americans to this day may well rejoice that the work of drawing the title deeds of our liberty devolved upon this greatest of Americans, the founder of the Democratic party—the immortal Jefferson. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Jefferson said:

> I know no safe depository of the ultimate powers of the society but the people themselves; and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with a wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take away from them, but to inform their discretion by education.

I have not time, Mr. Speaker, to pursue this thought further. I will quote, however, a brief part of the speech delivered by Mr. Webster in Faneuil Hall in the memorial exercises when he delivered that great speech on Adams and Jefferson. He said:

> On July 1, 1775, it was voted that a committee be selected to prepare a declaration. The committee was elected by ballot, July 2, and consisted of Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, Roger Sherman, and Robert R. Livingston. Jefferson received the highest vote and Adams the next highest vote. * * * Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Adams were requested by the other members to act as a subcommittee to prepare the draft, and Mr. Jefferson drew this paper.
> It is the production of his mind, and the high honor of it belongs to him clearly and absolutely. The cause of American independence was now to be presented to the world in such manner, if it might so be, as to engage its sympathy, but to command respect, to attract its admiration, and in an assembly of most able and distinguished men Thomas Jefferson had the high honor of being the selected advocate of this cause. To say that he performed his great work well would be doing him injustice. To say that he did excellently well would be inadequate and halting praise. Let us rather say that he so discharged the duty assigned him that all Americans may well rejoice that the work of drawing the title deed of their liberties devolved on him.
> Their fame is indeed safe. That is now treasured up beyond the reach of accident. Although no sculptured marble should rise to their memory, nor engraved stone bear record of their deeds, yet will their remembrance be as lasting as the land they honored. Marble columns may indeed molder into dust; time may efface all impress from the crumbling stone, but their fame remains; for with American liberty it rose and with American liberty only can it perish. Their bodies are buried in peace, but their name liveth evermore.

Hamilton lives to-day, it is true, but he lives as a man who doubted the right and power and ability of the people to govern themselves. While the roar of British cannons in the ears of our victorious people had hardly ceased, he undertook to establish a monarchy and despotism upon the country. I had rather proclaim my faith and devotion to the man who wrote the title deeds to American Independence, and who has well been said, "With whom American liberty rose and with forgetfulness of the principle which he taught can only America die," and follow him than the one who would have left our country a kingdom or an empire.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman also detailed what he said the Republican party had done in many instances. He claimed the credit for all legislation that was enacted. I have not the time to read the papers, nor would I undertake to weary the committee with the facts which I will put in the RECORD, but I make this statement and I will prove it by Republicans, that the first effective bill for the purpose of regulating interstate commerce was introduced in a Democratic House and passed by a Democratic House and sent to a Republican Senate, and that Democrat was John H. Reagan, of Texas. [Applause.] Now, I am going to prove that by the word of a Republican, formerly governor of Iowa. Here is what Governor Larrabee said in his work on the railroad question on page 352:

> In 1878 Mr. John H. Reagan, of Texas, introduced into the House of Representatives a bill for an act to regulate railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce. This may be said to have been the first real interstate-commerce bill before Congress. It was a progressive, thorough, and well-planned measure, but failed to receive the approval of Congress, because the majority of its Members considered it too radical a measure. The bill contained many of the provisions of the present interstate-commerce act, including the antipooling and the long and short haul clauses, but instead of creating a commission it lodged in the courts, both State and Federal, power to enforce the law.
> Other bills were introduced from year to year, but none of them drew sufficient votes to make it a law. Congress may be said to be divided into three camps on the railroad question:
> 1. Those who favored the system of regulation proposed by Mr. Reagan.
> 2. Those who favor the commission system.
> 3. Those who are opposed to every mode of Federal regulation of interstate commerce.
> In the meantime the inactivity of Congress caused considerable restlessness among the people, and the demand for action became louder every year.
> The issue entered into politics, and a number of Western Congressmen owed their failure to be reelected to their indifference or enmity to the Federal railroad legislation. (See Larrabee's Railroad Question, p. 352.)

Now, that is true. Now, you say all laws upon the statute books have been passed by Republican Congresses and signed by Republican Presidents. You forget you had a Democratic President in the White House in 1887, and this first bill of interstate-commerce regulation, introduced by Reagan and supplemented by the Senate, was passed through this House by the Democrats and signed by a Democratic President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE INTERSTATE-COMMERCE LAW.

That history may be kept straight upon this subject, let it be recalled that on June 5, 1866, the Republicans in Congress, with a view to having the railroads of the country which did an interstate business placed under the control of Congress, passed the act to be found at section 5258 of the Revised Statutes, and it was under this statute that it was decided that these railroads were not subject to State regulation, and from 1866 to 1906 the Republican party never enacted any law which looked to the control and regulation of railroad rates. It took them forty years to enact a rate-regulation law, and it took them twenty years from 1886, when their attention was called to it, to enact a law. But the attention of the country had previously—in 1874—been specifically called to transportation conditions existing at that time by what was known as the "Windom report," made to Congress by virtue of a resolution passed by Congress on December 16, 1872. The Windom committee was appointed by reason of the fact that the President of the United States in his message had called the attention of Congress to the subject. In this message it was stated that the subject was one of such importance as would force itself upon the legislative branch of the Government sooner or later, and therefore suggested that a committee or commission be authorized to consider the question and report to Congress for its better guidance in legislating on the important subject. What was known as the "Windom committee" did make an investigation, and from their report I submit the following extract:

DEFECTS AND ABUSES OF EXISTING SYSTEMS OF TRANSPORTATION.

Concisely stated, the defects and abuses alleged against the existing systems of transportation are insufficient facilities, unfair discriminations, and extortionate charges.

With reference to the matter of facilities, it is believed that the improvement of natural waterways and the construction of additional channels of water communication have been wholly inadequate to the growing demands of trade, and by reason of this neglect on the part of the Government the commerce of the country has been compelled to accept the more expensive methods afforded by railroads; that railway companies, having thus secured a substantial monopoly of the business of transportation, have failed to recognize their responsibilities to the public or to meet the just demands of the rapidly increasing commerce between the interior and the seaboard.

Discriminating and extortionate charges, however, constitute the chief grounds of complaint. The principal causes which are supposed to produce such charges, and which have aggravated and intensified the public discontent, may be summarized as follows:

1. "Stock watering," a well-known process by which the capital stock of a company is largely increased for purely speculative purposes without any corresponding expenditure on the part of its recipients.

2. Capitalization of surplus earnings. By this process the net profits over and above the amount paid on interest and dividends, are supposed to be expended in permanent improvements and charged up to capital account, for which additional stock is issued and increased charges rendered necessary to meet the increased dividends required. It is insisted that this is a double form of taxation, first, in the exorbitant charges from which such surplus profits are derived, and, second, in the conversion of such surplus into capital stock, thereby compelling the business of the country to pay increased charges on all future transactions, in order to provide dividends on capital thus unjustly obtained. It is argued with great force that as all the legitimate claims of railroad companies are met by the public when it has paid a fair and reasonable return for the capital invested and services rendered, any surplus earnings expended in improvements should inure to its benefit, instead of being made the basis of future exactions. In brief, the people believe that by this process they are first robbed and then compelled to pay interest on their own money.

3. The introduction of intermediate agencies, such as car companies, fast-freight lines, etc.

4. "Construction rings" and other means by which the managers are supposed to make large profits in the building of railways, which are charged up to the cost of the road.

5. Unfair adjustments of through and local rates, and unjust discriminations against certain localities, whereby one community is compelled to pay unreasonable charges in order that another more favored may pay less than the services are worth. This will be fully considered hereafter in the discussion of the "equal mileage rates."

6. General extravagance and corruption in railway management, whereby favorites are enriched and the public impoverished.

7. Combinations and consolidations of railway companies, by which free competition is destroyed and the producing and commercial interests of the company handed over to the control of monopolies, who are thereby enabled to enforce upon the public the exorbitant rates rendered necessary by the causes above named.

8. The system of operating fast and slow trains on the same road, whereby the cost of freight movement is believed to be largely increased. This is, perhaps, the misfortune rather than the fault of railway companies. It is doubtless a necessity growing out of the conditions under which our railway system has been developed.

Of the defects and abuses above mentioned, perhaps none have contributed so much to the general discontent and indignation as the increase of railway capital by "stock watering" and capitalization of surplus earnings. It is freely conceded that a fair and even a liberal remuneration should be paid for capital actually invested, but that the industry of the country should be taxed for all time to meet dividends on paper capital is indignantly denied.

To what extent the nominal railway capital of the country is represented by fictitious stock is not easy to determine. The manner in which railway accounts are usually kept renders it very difficult for the managers themselves to state what proportion of the entire cost of a given road was paid by the stockholders and what part from the surplus earnings. Replacements and improvements are constantly being made and paid for out of current receipts. It was quite impossible for the committee to obtain accurate information on this point without going into a detailed investigation of the accounts of the several companies extending over a long series of years and involving, in many cases, the cross-examination of reluctant witnesses, which would have consumed the entire time of the committee to the exclusion of all other matters.

Enough is known of the extent and vicious effects of such stock manipulations to justify the adoption of prompt and efficient means for their prevention in the future. The conclusions at which the committee have arrived in regard to the practical measures of relief to be recommended to Congress render it unnecessary to enter upon a detailed examination of such stock transactions by the several railways engaged in transportation between the interior and the seaboard. A very few facts may serve to illustrate the nature and extent of this abuse.

From this it would appear that the transportation conditions, charges, and manner of conducting the business were about the same in 1874 as in 1906. Yet with all these facts before them, with the report of the committee showing that discriminatory and extortionate charges were being made and were the subject of widespread complaint, that stock watering was engaged in, that there was general extravagance and corruption in railway management whereby favorites were enriched and the public impoverished, and that the numerous evils of rebating, the granting of special rates and discriminations, existed as in recent years—with all these facts before the Republican Congress in 1874, it took them thirty years to enact any legislation upon the subject that was effective.

The subject of the control of the railroads as agencies of transportation and the charges that they should make upon the people had long been discussed prior to any action by the United States Government.

In England from 1854 to 1873 the contest was being waged between the railroads and the people in Parliament, until finally, in 1873, England enacted what was known as the "railways regulation act," which, although it has been somewhat amended, is in force to-day.

So that the Republican party, which was in control of the Government all these years, with the exception of two, from 1860, is far behind even England in regulating the matter of transportation by railroads.

The States early took up the matter, and many States enacted laws for the regulation of railroad transportation charges prior to the time that the Congress of the United States passed any law on the subject.

At the time that the first act to regulate interstate commerce was passed by Congress, on February 4, 1887, there were twenty-five States of the Union that had prior to that time established railroad commissions and had undertaken to regulate the charges for railroad transportation. The States continued to enforce their laws and to regulate these charges until the rendition by the Supreme Court of the United States, on October 25, 1886, of the decision in the case of the Wabash and St. Louis Railroad v. Illinois (118 U. S. Rep., 557), in which the Supreme Court held that the State railroad commission of Illinois could not regulate the charges for carrying freight that was interstate in its character.

Thus we fix the date as October, 1886, when the Supreme Court for the first time decided that the State railroad commissions, which were then in existence and were undertaking to regulate these charges by railroads, could not regulate the rates on interstate shipments, and from that date until 1906 the Republican party, which was in control of the Government, with the exception of two years, never did anything to relieve the people from the extortionate charges made upon them by the interstate railroads.

As I will prove, a Democrat, Judge Reagan, of Texas, was the first Member of Congress who really undertook to enact a law by Congress along this line.

Nothing was done in this direction until the Forty-ninth Congress, when Judge Reagan again introduced a bill on the subject, and, the House being Democratic, he secured from the committee the report of a bill regulating the railroads engaged in interstate commerce. When this bill was reported to the House a minority report was filed by certain prominent Republican members of the committee, which was as follows:

The minority of the committee, therefore, have not favored the insertion of the provision preventing, under all circumstances, the granting of drawbacks and rebates, because cases were cited before the Committee on Commerce, in hearings, in which drawbacks or rebates were absolutely necessary to enable the domestic shipper to meet his foreign competitor on equal terms; always, however, in the opinion of the minority, having the system of drawbacks or rebates open to all under similar conditions and circumstances.

Nor do the minority favor the provisions prohibiting a greater charge for a shorter than a longer haul, as it was shown to a satisfactory degree, as we think, in the hearings, that where two competing points were connected by water as well as rail it was impossible for the railways to secure the traffic unless they made their rates as low as the water rates, and that while they might be able to do this on a portion of their traffic it would be destructive of their interests to reduce all their rates to those which were forced upon them between certain points by the competition of the water rates. The minority consider that in this also unjust discrimination should never be made, but that the idea of charging the same rate for a haul under similar conditions and circumstances should be adhered to.

The minority also differ from the majority upon the subject of "pooling." They believe that its absolute prohibition is unnecessary. There should be legislation imposing restrictive provisions, for shippers should not be placed at a disadvantage or competition in freight charges lessened so that transporters only should be benefited. If fairly carried out and not done by secret and private arrangement, if resorted to for the purpose of preventing what is called injudicious "cutting down" of rates so that reasonable and just charges should be permanently adhered to, are the means by which transporters endeavor, or ought to endeavor, to secure fair rates upon the traffic which they carry, "pooling" would not be open to many of the objections made to it.

Past experience in railway transportation has satisfied transporters that pooling is the nearest and fairest device yet used to enable them to place shippers upon an equality and prevent grievous discrimination in favor of the large shippers as against the smaller ones.

This minority report was signed by Charles O'Neill, Robert T. Davis, Ransom W. Durham, and Frederick A. Johnson, all Republicans. See House Reports, first session Forty-ninth Congress, volume 3, House Report No. 902.

From this it would appear that these gentlemen were in favor of pooling by the railroads, the granting of rebates and other practices which have continued from then until recent years. The bill passed the House, but upon its passage it was resisted by a number of Republican Members of the House, and one prominent Republican, who for twenty years thereafter remained a Member of Congress—General Grosvenor, of Ohio—made one of the leading speeches in opposition to the bill. Upon its passage forty-one Members of the House voted against it, all of them Republicans with the exception, so far as I can ascertain, of five. The bill went to the Senate; it was reported from the Senate committee by substitute and went to conference, and when the conference report was made to the House it was still opposed by a vote of forty-one Members—the same gentlemen who had voted against the bill in the House, chiefly Republican Members. Prior to this time, in March, 1885, a committee had been appointed by the Senate to investigate and report upon the subject of transportation by railroads, and so forth, and on January 8, 1886, a report was made to the Senate from this committee by Senator CULLOM in which attention was called to transportation conditions and the charges made upon the public. Some of the main points of the report are as follows:

The widely varying methods which have been adopted by different governments in dealing with the problems of railway development and regulations may be grouped as follows:

1. The policy of private ownership and private management—

(a) Without interference or supervision by the government.

(b) Subject to compulsory and penal legislation for control and regulation of rates.

(c) Subject to investigation by a commission with advisory powers and depending largely upon public opinion for the enforcement of its recommendations.

(d) Subject to investigation by a commission with power to fix and regulate rates.

2. Exclusive state ownership and government management.

3. State ownership and private management under government supervision and control.

4. Partial state ownership and management in competition with private ownership and management.

Regulation through State ownership has been practically unknown in the United States. It is of foreign origin and is foreign to the character of our institutions. The time may come when the people of the United States will be forced to consider the advisability of placing the railways of the country completely under the control of the General Government, as the postal service is and as many believe the telegraph service should be. This would seem to be the surest method of securing the highest perfection and greatest efficiency of the railroad system in its entirety, and the best method of making it an harmonious whole in its operation, and of bringing about that uniformity and stability of rates which is the greatest need of trade and commerce. But the dangers to be apprehended from giving such vast additional powers to the Government will always prove a formidable barrier to the adoption of such a policy, and this committee sees no necessity for considering its advantages or disadvantages until other methods of regulation more American in spirit have at least been given a trial and have proved unsatisfactory. Nor is it deemed important to investigate in detail the experience of those European nations in which the policy of State ownership or management in one form or another has prevailed.

THE NECESSITY OF NATIONAL REGULATION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The two propositions which the committee has kept prominently in view throughout the entire investigation have been whether any legislation for the regulation of interstate transportation is necessary or expedient; and if so, in what manner can the public interest be best subserved by legislation on that subject.

The consideration of the first proposition may seem to be a work of supererogation, for it is the deliberate judgment of the committee that upon no public question are the people so nearly unanimous as upon the proposition that Congress should undertake in some way the regulation of interstate commerce. Omitting those who speak for the railroad interests, there is practically no difference of opinion as to the necessity and importance of such action by Congress, and this is fully substantiated by the testimony accompanying this report, which is a fair consensus of public sentiment upon the question. The committee has found among the leading representatives of the railroad interests an increasing readiness to accept the aid of Congress in working out the solution of the railroad problem which has obstinately baffled all their efforts, and not a few of the ablest railroad men of the country seem disposed to look to the intervention of Congress as promising to afford the best means of ultimately securing a more equitable and satisfactory adjustment of the relations of the transportation interests to the community than they themselves have been able to bring about.

The evidence upon this point is so conclusive that the committee has no hesitation in declaring that prompt action by Congress upon this important subject is almost unanimously demanded by public sentiment.

This demand is occasioned by the existence of acknowledged evils incident to and growing out of the complicated business of transportation as now conducted, evils which the people believe can be checked and mitigated, if not wholly remedied, by appropriate legislation. The committee recognizes the justice of this demand, and believes that action by Congress looking to the regulation of interstate transportation is necessary and expedient, for the following reasons:

1. The public interest demands regulation of the business of transportation because, in the absence of such regulation, the carrier is practically and actually the sole and final arbiter upon all disputed questions that arise between shipper and carrier as to whether rates are reasonable or unjust discrimination has been practiced.

2. It is the duty of Congress to undertake the regulation of the business of transportation, because of admitted abuses in its management and of acknowledged discriminations between persons and places in its practical operation—evils which it is possible to reach and remedy only through the exercise of the powers granted by the Constitution to Congress, and against which the citizen is entitled to the protection and relief the national authority can alone afford. * * *

4. National legislation is also necessary, because the business of transportation is essentially of a nature which requires that uniform system and method regulation which the national authority can alone prescribe.

The keynote to all the decisions of the United States Supreme Court concerning the power to regulate commerce is found in the declaration made in Cooley v. Board of Wardens, and frequently referred to in other cases, that "whatever subjects of this power are in their nature national, or admit of only one uniform system or plan of regulation, may justly be said to be of such nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress;" and, as is said by the court in the late case of Gloucester Ferry Company v. Pennsylvania, "it needs no argument to show that the commerce with foreign nations and between the States, which consists in the transportation of persons and property between them, is a subject of national character, and requires uniformity of regulation. Congress alone, therefore, can deal with such transportation."

THE CAUSES OF COMPLAINT AGAINST THE RAILROAD SYSTEM.

The complaints against the railroad system of the United States expressed to the committee are based upon the following charges:

1. That local rates are unreasonably high, compared with through rates.

2. That both local and through rates are unreasonably high at non-competing points, either from the absence of competition or in consequence of pooling agreements that restrict its operations.

3. That rates are established without apparent regard to the actual cost of the service performed, and are based largely on "what the traffic will bear."

4. That unjustifiable discriminations are constantly being made between individuals in the rates charged for like service under similar circumstances.

5. That improper discriminations are made between articles of freight and branches of business of a like character, and between different quantities of the same class of freight.

6. That unreasonable discriminations are made between localities similarly situated.

7. That the effect of the prevailing policy of railroad management is, by an elaborate system of secret special rates, rebates, drawbacks, and concessions, to foster monopoly, to enrich favored shippers, and to prevent free competition in many lines of trade in which the item of transportation is an important factor.

8. That such favoritism and secrecy introduce an element of uncertainty into legitimate business that greatly retards the development of our industries and commerce.

9. That the secret cutting of rates and the sudden fluctuations that constantly take place are demoralizing to all business except that of a purely speculative character, and frequently occasion great injustice and heavy losses.

10. That in the absence of national and uniform legislation the railroads are able by various devices to avoid their responsibility as carriers, especially on shipments over more than one road, or from one State to another, and that shippers find great difficulty in recovering damages for the loss of property or for injury thereto.

11. That railroads refuse to be bound by their own contracts, and arbitrarily collect large sums in the shape of overcharges in addition to the rates agreed upon at the time of shipment.

12. That railroads often refuse to recognize or be responsible for the acts of dishonest agents acting under their authority.

13. That the common law fails to afford a remedy for such grievances, and that in cases of dispute the shipper is compelled to submit to the decision of the railroad manager or pool commissioner, or run the risk of incurring further losses by greater discriminations.

14. That the differences in the classifications in use in various parts of the country, and sometimes for shipments over the same roads in different directions, are a fruitful source of misunderstandings, and are often made a means of extortion.

15. That a privileged class is created by the granting of passes, and that the cost of the passenger service is largely increased by the extent of this abuse.

16. That the capitalization and bonded indebtedness of the roads largely exceed the actual cost of their construction or their present value, and that unreasonable rates are charged in the effort to pay dividends on watered stock and interest on bonds improperly issued.

17. That railroad corporations have improperly engaged in lines of business entirely distinct from that of transportation, and that undue advantages have been afforded to business enterprises in which railroad officials were interested.

18. That the management of the railroad business is extravagant and wasteful, and that a needless tax is imposed upon the shipping and traveling public by the unnecessary expenditure of large sums in the maintenance of a costly force of agents engaged in a reckless strife for competitive business.

THE ESSENCE OF THE COMPLAINTS.

It will be observed that the most important, and, in fact, nearly all, of the foregoing complaints are based upon the practice of discrimination in one form or another. This is the principal cause of complaint against the management and operation of the transportation system of the United States, and gives rise to the questions of greatest difficulty in the regulation of interstate commerce.

It is substantially agreed by all parties in interest that the great desideratum is to secure equality, so far as practicable, in the facilities for transportation afforded and the rates charged by the instrumentalities of commerce. The burden of complaint is against unfair differences in these particulars as between different places, persons, and commodities, and its essence is that these differences are unjust in comparison with the rates allowed or facilities afforded to other persons and places for a like service under similar circumstances.

On February 24, 1887, Congress passed the act under which the present Interstate Commerce Commission was established. This Commission proceeded along the line that it had the power, after hearing, to fix rates, and they did so for ten years. This statement is borne out by the following extract from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1897:

The Commission has never claimed the right to prescribe the rate in the first instance. In one of the earliest cases (Thatcher v. Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, 1 I. C. C. Rep., 152–156) the Commission said, speaking of its relation to the making of rates:

"Its power in respect to rates is to determine whether those which the roads impose are, for any reason, in conflict with the statute."

In Cincinnati Freight Bureau v. Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company and others (7 I. C. C. Rep., 191), which was one of the latest cases decided, and in which the opinion was published about the same time with the opinion of the Supreme Court in the above case, it was said:

"This Commission is not primarily a rate-making body. The carrier is left free to arrange its own tariffs in the first instance. We sit for the correction of what is unreasonable and unjust in those tariffs."

It will be seen, therefore, that the Commission has never assumed to make the rate. It has assumed that it was charged, under the act, with the duty of determining whether the rate complained of was just and reasonable, and, if found to be unjust and unreasonable, of correcting that violation of the statute. In doing so it has been assumed that the plain, and in fact, the only way to do this was to prohibit the charging of the unreasonable rate and compel the charging of one that was reasonable. Up to the present time the Commission has proceeded upon this theory. Of the 135 formal orders made in suits actually heard, from its institution down to the present time, 68 have prescribed a change of rate for the future.

The decision above referred to determines that all this is wrong. We can proceed no further along the lines followed in the past. No relief can be given in the cases which are now before us. An entirely new system must be adopted. We can no longer inquire what shall be done in the future.

In its report for 1897 the Interstate Commerce Commission made the following recommendation, among others:

"That section 6 of the act be amended to read as follows:

"If the Commission is of the opinion that the rates, fares, or charges, as filed and published, or the classification, or the privileges, facilities, and regulations published in connection therewith are unreasonable or otherwise in violation of law, it shall determine what are and will be reasonable and otherwise lawful rates, fares, charges, classification, privileges, facilities, or regulations, and shall prescribe the same, and shall order the carrier or carriers to file and publish, on or before a certain day, to take effect on a certain day, schedules in accordance with the decision of the Commission."

The so-called "Reagan-Cullom bill" was passed and enforced till the case of The Railroad v. The Interstate Commerce Commission was decided, on March 30, 1896; again followed on March 24, 1897, and, finally, on November 8, 1897, in 168 United States, 145. In that case Judge Harlan, speaking for himself and the other judges who dissented, said:

Taken in connection with the other decisions defining the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the present decision goes far to make that Commission a useless body, for all practical purposes, and to defeat many of the important objects designed to be accomplished by the various enactments of Congress relating to interstate commerce. The Commission was established to protect the public against the improper practices of transportation companies engaged in commerce among the several States. It has been left, it is true, with power to make reports and issue protests, but it has been shorn by judicial interpretation of authority to do anything of an effective character. It is denied many of the powers which, in my judgment, were intended to be conferred upon it.

Not until March, 1896, was it determined by the Supreme Court of the United States that power had not been given the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates after a hearing. In the case of The Railroad Company v. The Interstate Commerce Commission (162 U. S. Rep., 184), it was for the first time intimated that the Commission had no such power. Again, on May 24, 1897, in the case of The Commission v. Railroad Company (167 U. S. Rep., 479), the Supreme Court virtually decided that the Commission had no such power, and finally, on November 8, 1897, in the case of The Commission v. The Alabama Railroad Company (168 U. S. Rep., 145), it was definitely decided and determined by the Supreme Court that the Commission had no such power. From that day until June, 1906, for ten years, the people had been insisting and clamoring for an amendment of the interstate commerce act giving the Commission the power to fix rates after a hearing. The Democratic party took the matter up in all of its conventions, in 1896, 1900, and 1904, and wrote demands for this reform in its platforms:

The absorption of wealth by the few, the consolidation of our leading railroad systems, and the formation of trusts and pools require a strict control by the Federal Government of those arteries of commerce. We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such restriction and guaranties in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

Again in 1900 we declared:

[Declarations from Democratic platform, 1900.]

CORPORATE INTERFERENCE IN GOVERNMENT.

"Corporations should be protected in all their rights and their legitimate interests should be respected, but any attempt by corporations to interfere with the public affairs of the people, or to control the sovereignty which creates them, should be forbidden under such penalties as will make such attempts impossible."

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

"We favor such an enlargement of the scope of the interstate commerce law as will enable the Commission to protect individuals and communities from discriminations and the public from unjust and unfair transportation rates."

And again in 1904 we said:

[Declarations from Democratic platform, 1904.]

TRUSTS AND UNLAWFUL COMBINES.

"Individual equality of opportunity and free competition are essential to a healthy and permanent commercial prosperity, and any trust, combination, or monopoly tending to destroy these by controlling production, restricting competition, or fixing prices should be prohibited and punished by law. We especially denounce rebates and discrimination by transportation companies as the most potent agency in promoting and strengthening these unlawful conspiracies against trade."

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

"We demand an enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the end that the traveling public and shippers of this country may have prompt and adequate relief from the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation. We demand a strict enforcement of existing civil and criminal statutes against all such trusts, combinations, and monopolies, and we demand the enactment of such further legislation as may be necessary to effectually suppress them."

The platforms of the Republican party were absolutely silent upon the subject, and neither their platforms nor their candidates ever suggested or advocated the passage of any law to give the Interstate Commerce Commission this power until after the election of 1904. As evidence of what was being done along that line, I quote the following extract from an address by Mr. E. P. Bacon, the chairman of the executive committee of the Interstate Commerce Law Convention, at Milwaukee, on June 23, 1904. In referring to what progress had been made by Congress to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to make its rulings operative and to continue them until they were overruled or suspended by the courts, Mr. Bacon said:

The proposed legislation has been strenuously urged upon Congress during the past three sessions by the various commercial and manufacturing organizations of the country with increasing energy from year to year, but thus far without having secured the reporting of any bill introduced for the purpose to either branch of Congress. Exhaustive hearings were had during the last session of the Fifty-seventh Congress before the Committees on Interstate Commerce of the respective Houses on bills to this effect then pending, which resulted in the reporting of a single section of what was known as the "Elkins bill," which was promptly enacted into law, and was approved February 19, 1903, the purpose of which was the prevention of discrimination between individuals, which seems to have been effectual in the prevention of this form of discrimination.

The effort was vigorously renewed at the last session of Congress to secure the reporting of a bill introduced in both Houses at the instance of the committee which I have the honor to represent, and known as the "Quarles-Cooper bill," for the purpose of preventing discrimination between localities or sections and between different descriptions of traffic, and also to prevent the continuance of rates unreasonable in themselves; but, owing to the opposition of the leading members of the Interstate Commerce Committees of the two Houses to any legislation further restricting the power of the carriers to make and enforce such rates as they may see fit, it has thus far been impossible to secure action on the part of either committee.

A majority of the members of the House committee, however, have individually declared themselves to be in favor of the enactment of such legislation, and it is believed that upon the reassembling of Congress they will insist upon immediate action on the subject on the part of the committee, in which case it is hoped that some bill comprising these provisions will be speedily reported, and, if so, the committee is confident of its passage in the House by a large majority, and there is good reason for the expectation of its passage through the Senate.

While the immediate interests of shippers as such are limited to the prevention of discrimination in its various forms, and their being thereby protected against any undue advantage in favor of their competitors in their own or other localities and sections, the interest of the public at large extends to the question of the reasonableness of freight charges in themselves and demands protection against the levying of charges at the pleasure of the carriers by means of effective governmental supervision. The country has been confronted during the last four years by continuous advances in rates of freight throughout the country, first by means of a general change in classification, put into effect January 1, 1900, by which upward of 800 different commodities were raised from a lower to a higher class, and consequently subjected to higher rates of freight, the average increase resulting therefrom, as calculated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, having been 24 per cent. This has been followed by direct advances in rates on a number of important commodities of general use from time to time.

"In reply to a resolution of inquiry made by the Senate in March last, as to the effect of the advances in rates of freight made during the preceding four years upon the revenues of the carriers, the Commission reported that the average rate per ton received by the carriers on traffic transported during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, was 12¾ cents per ton greater than the average rate per ton for the fiscal year 1899 and amounted to an increase in revenue of more than $155,000,000 for the year over what it would have been at the average rate charged in the fiscal year 1899. The report shows an increase in tonnage for the year 1903 of 10.9 per cent, with an increase of revenue of 25.6 per cent."

These facts also appear in the report of the Industrial Commission, made to the Fifty-seventh Congress on February 10, 1902.

On May 14, 1900, the Industrial Commission transmitted its preliminary report of its investigation of transportation and the discriminations made by the railroads between individuals. In that report they stated that such discrimination was carried on to a greater extent than ever, and they show in the report that there was a general feeling that the interstate-commerce law should be amended so as to increase the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; that the Commission had found its powers constantly decreasing, especially by the interpretations of the courts, and that its influence at that time was chiefly an educational one, and suggested, as one of the remedies, that the Commission should be given the power to revise tariffs framed by the railroads, either on its own initiative or after complaint, and to reduce or change unreasonable rates, fixing the rate that should prevail in the future.

This will be found in volume 4 of the report of the Industrial Commission, page 20.

Finally, in 1905, heeding the demands of the people and the recommendations of the President in his message to Congress in December, 1904, the House did pass a pretext of a bill, called the "Esch-Townsend bill," which was sent to the Senate but was never taken up or seriously considered by that body, which was at that time, as it has been for several years, overwhelmingly Republican. When the bill known as the "Hepburn rate bill" passed the House in 1906 and was sent to the Senate, it could only be reported from the Senate committee by Democratic votes, and so prominent were the Democrats of the Senate in securing a favorable report, and so responsible were they for its passage through the committee that the management and control of that bill was turned over by the members of that committee to the Democratic Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. The bill was recognized to be so contrary to what the Republican party had stood for theretofore that it was repudiated by the Republican members of the Commerce Committee of the Senate and turned over to the Democrats to pass through the Senate; and while it is true that Republicans of both Houses voted for and supported it, yet the fact remains that the insistent demands of the Democrats, in their platforms and before the people and their votes in the House and the Senate, secured the enactment of the law.

From these documents it will be shown that the Republican party in 1866 passed a very simple-looking act which authorized the various interstate railroads to have through rates, and therefore became only controllable by Congress, but when the States step by step passed their laws to regulate railroads, as they did until 1866, under a decision of the Supreme Court in the Wabash case, it was decided they could not do that. General Grant recommended an investigation of this matter of interstate-commerce railroads in 1872, and there resulted from it a report, made by then Senator Windom, and I will put into the RECORD the parts of that report to to which I desire to call attention. Attention was called to other abuses existing then, that have existed since in this country, and exist now, such as stock watering, capitalization of surplus earnings, introduction of intermediate agencies, construction rings, general extravagance, corruption in railway management whereby officers are enriched and the public impoverished, combinations, consolidation of railroad companies, and so forth. Oh, you are a constructive party, prompt to answer the demands of the people; yet from 1874 down to 1886, in full control of the Government for forty-eight years excepting two years, you never did a thing or enacted a law that took the choking, throttling hand of the railroad companies from the throat of the people, by which they extorted from them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You are a constructive party with this report before you, in which General Grant called attention to the fact that bill after bill was introduced, and yet not until the grand and great old Democrat from Texas was heard in a Democratic House have you ever consented to yield a particle or pass a law for the interest of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. I was going to inquire what sort of a law regulating railroads and other corporations was passed by a Democratic Congress that came in in 1893.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to inquire what sort of a law regulating railroads and other corporations was passed by the Democratic Congress in 1893?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. We already had a law upon the statute books, passed in 1886, and that law was followed and the Interstate Commerce Commission were administering it, and not until March 24, 1896, did the Supreme Court declare that power did not exist under that Democratic measure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I want to state this, that, as I have said, the law was passed in March, 1887, and went upon the statute books. I have the report of the Railroad Commission here of 1897, from which I will read that report made by that distinguished Democrat, William H. Morrison, of Illinois, then the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which he called attention to the fact that by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States the Commission had been shorn of its power to exercise a power which it exercised in 182 cases that had come before it, 67 of which had been carried to the courts, and no question had ever arisen until the case in 162 United States, of The Commission v. New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railroad, in which the power of the Commission was questioned as to fixing the rates for the future.

I have referred to the dissenting opinion of Judge Harlan, a Republican judge upon the Supreme Court bench, in that case, in which he said that the decision robbed the Commission of the power which it had exercised for ten years, and which it was not doubted that it had. Six months after this decision was made there assembled a Democratic convention in 1896 to nominate a Democratic candidate for President and write it in a Democratic platform, which was, in my judgment, a second Declaration of Independence for the people. We declared in that platform of 1896, following this decision, for an increase of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that there might be given to this great Department of the Government, inaugurated by the brain and carried out by the force of Democrats in the House, power to protect the people. And so on down to 1904.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow me just to add one thing?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. My understanding is, from good authority, that every time Congress met after that they were appealed to by the Commission to give them that power, but in vain.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I have the request of the Commission here, and I have the reports in reference to that. Now, you, the Republican party, are responsible for this legislation, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Where, in a party platform, since its organization down to the present hour—that is, in a national platform—have you a line or letter or syllable declaring in favor of giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other executive body the power to regulate and fix rates and make them reasonable? I pause for a reply from the gentleman from Pennsylvania in order that he may tell me where, in any platform, they made any such pledges. You did not make them. The President of the United States took the Democratic platform and made you pass what laws were passed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I am reminded by the position the Republicans occupied upon this and the trust question of a few lines from a Massachusetts poet, who was a Republican, and he called it "The Candidate's Creed." I will call it "The Present Republicans' Creed," and this is what they believe in:

THE REPUBLICANS' CREED.

I believe in bein' this
  Or that, ez it may happen
One way or t'other hendiest is,
  To ketch the people nappin':
It ain't by princirples nor men
  My preudent course is steadied;
I scent which pays the best, an' then
  Go into it baldheaded.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

I might apply that not only to the Republican majority of this House, but a little higher up—to the Chief Executive.

In reference to the antitrust question, I want to say that the antitrust bill introduced by Mr. Sherman, known as "bill No. 1, first session, Fifty-first Congress," was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, and it did not have a thing that Mr. Sherman ever wrote in it except the enacting clause. When it went upon the statute books it was the product mainly of the brains of four men, namely, Senator George, of Mississippi, Senator George G. Vest, of Missouri, Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, and Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Sherman would not have recognized the bill that was reported as his own if he had met it in the road. Or, if he had recognized it, he would have looked at it as a cow would look at a last year's calf through a crack in the fence. He might have thought he knew it, but he would have thought again that he did not.

But there was one thing that was accomplished by the antitrust law. You throttled and destroyed the labor unions; and if you are proud of that, you are welcome to the consolation you can get out of it. You voted down a proposition in the Senate, or accepted the amendment that was offered by Mr. George, of Mississippi, to the Sherman bill, to exempt from the provisions the proposition not to include organizations of labor, organized for the purpose of lessening the hours or increasing wages, and those engaged in farming or horticulture. It was put on in the Senate, and then by one of those peculiar tricks it was recommitted to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and when it was reported this amendment was not upon the bill, and the bill passed. But this is not all the history.

On the 2d of June, 1900, the Democratic minority reported out of the Committee on the Judiciary to a bill which was reported to this House a provision which exempted labor organizations from the provisions of the antitrust law, and this House passed it, although they did not want to vote for it when it came to a roll call. They sought shelter and cover, except a few brave ones, like the Speaker, the Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD]. They voted against it. It went to the Senate on the 2d day of June, 1902, and from that day to this you have had the opportunity to relieve the labor organizations from the burden of being included in the antitrust law, and you have not done it. You have accomplished wonders by the antitrust law. You have destroyed labor altogether as an organization. You are welcome to it if you get any benefit from it.

The following I extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

"Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with the view of lessening the number of hours of labor, or of increasing their wages, nor to any arrangements, agreements of combinations, among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with the view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products."

But when the bill was passed it had no such provision.

But later, on May 31, 1900, I recall that—and in this I am sustained by the RECORD—in discussing House joint resolution No. 138, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, Mr. Ray, a Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said:

The necessity for this proposed amendment grows out of the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the word "commerce," as used in the Constitution, does not include manufacture or production within its legitimate meaning. All articles of commerce are subjects of commerce, but not a part of it. Therefore the constitutional provision, section 8, Article I, that "The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes," gives Congress no power whatever over corporations, combinations, associations, or conspiracies organized or formed for the purpose of monopolizing manufacture and production and so control prices, really dominate commerce, and wring unjust exactions from the people. (See p. 6307 of the RECORD, May 31, 1900, vol. 33; also p. 654, Bills and Debates in Congress Relating to Trusts.)

"The only power Congress has in the premises is derived from the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and this extends only to laws affecting the product of a monopoly or 'combine' when in course of transit to another State or to a foreign country." (P. 6312 of the RECORD, vol. 33, May 31, 1900.)

"Congress being powerless and the States impotent, where shall we turn? There is but one answer, and that is: Let the people of the nation through their respective State legislatures confer upon Congress—representing all the people of all the States, all the interests of this grand and mighty Republic—plenary power to define, regulate, prohibit, or dissolve all industrial trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of corporations or otherwise." (P. 6314, vol. 33 of the RECORD, May 31, 1900.)

And every Republican voted for the resolution.

In the Fifty-sixth Congress there were reported to the House from the Judiciary Committee two bills, one to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to confer upon Congress the authority to enact laws relative to trusts and corporations and one to amend the act of 1890, known as the "Sherman antitrust law."

The action of the House will be found on pages 6494 to 6502 of the RECORD.

The amendment exempting labor organizations, etc., was passed (see p. 6502), eight Republicans voting against it, among whom were CANNON and LITTLEFIELD.

The Democratic members of the Judiciary Committee reported the amendment, which was as follows:

Amend section 7 by inserting between the first words "that" and "this," in the first line of said section, the following words, to wit:

"Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to apply to trade unions or other labor organizations organized for the purpose of regulating wages, hours of labor, or other conditions under which labor is to be performed."

On June 2, 1900, this was adopted, went to the Senate, and slept the sleep of death.

But I have another Roland for my friend from Pennsylvania's Oliver. He read from the New York World to show that all the prosecutions of the trusts had been carried on under a Republican administration. He read the World. I do not often do so, but I am going to read a little from the World myself now. In the World of 1908, a much later one than the gentleman from Pennsylvania read, and probably a better one, I find:

DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTIAL NAMES—16 TO 1—NO. 9—A MIDDLE WESTERN CANDIDATE.

In 1895 when Judson Harmon, of Ohio, succeeded Richard Olney as Attorney-General in President Cleveland's Cabinet, he found the trans-Missouri freight case, which a circuit judge had decided adversely to the Government, peacefully slumbering in the archives.

Mr. Harmon took up the case on appeal, and in 1897 the Supreme Court held for the first time and established the principle that the Sherman antitrust law applied to railroads.

Mr. Harmon also began the Addyston pipe suit, which Judge William H. Taft decided in favor of the Government. This is the leading case as to the application of the antitrust law to combinations other than railroads.

Until Mr. Harmon's day the Cleveland Administration had manifested almost no interest in the enforcement of the Sherman law. He retired from office before the country reaped the fruit of his efforts. Under the reign of Hannaism, which Mr. Bryan and free silver forced upon the country, the Sherman act was again a dead letter. But then came Theodore Roosevelt, and with full knowledge of what Mr. Harmon had done, the President swung the power of the law against the Northern Securities Company and established beyond question the authority of the United States Government to destroy all combinations in restraint of interstate trade and commerce.

It was Mr. Harmon, too, who, as associate of Frederick N. Judson, of St. Louis, in investigating the Santa Fe rebate cases, reported to Mr. Roosevelt that guilt was always personal, and that the way to stop rebating was through the criminal prosecution of the men who had violated the law. The President refused to accept this advice. Had he followed it vigorously and consistently, he would have much less to explain, defend, and apologize for than he has to-day. There would be more "malefactors of great wealth" in the penitentiary and fewer at large to "conspire" against his Administration.

The gentleman read from the New York World to demonstrate that the Democrats had nothing to do with it. I have read from the New York World, an authority for which he vouched, and his witness that he can not impeach, that it was upon what had been done by a Democratic Attorney-General, Judson Harmon, of Ohio, that the President now in office was enabled to proceed and enforce the laws against trusts, especially against the Northern Securities Company.

But have you accomplished anything by your antitrust legislation except the destruction of the labor organization? The gentleman from Pennsylvania has referred to the Northern Securities case. In the Washington Herald of February 16, 1908, Mr. James J. Hill is reported to have said that the victory for the Government in that case was a myth; that he still controls the roads; that competition from the shippers' standpoint was not restored by the court's findings. In fact, Mr. Hill is reported in that article to have made it the subject of a joke at a banquet given in honor of himself and President Elliott, of the Northern Pacific, when he tapped his breast pocket and said:

We can not maintain holding companies for our roads, but they can not prevent us from carrying here stocks in as many roads as we choose to buy.

So that, instead of accomplishing anything by the Northern Securities case, you have simply been made the laughingstock of the great railroad magnates.

In referring to this matter I desire to quote also from the Macon Telegraph, as follows:

ALL THE CREDIT TO THE FOURTH MAN.

It is probable that the average American is quite firmly convinced that Mr. Roosevelt is the only President who has caused the prosecution of a trust, or at least the only one who has done so to any purpose or considerable extent. Such are the results of spectacular and oratorical statesmanship.

The facts and the popular impression are widely at variance. It has been asserted that the Sherman antitrust law was a dead letter until Mr. Roosevelt became President, and yet the Philadelphia Record some time since and the New York Sun only the other day have both shown from the records that Mr. Roosevelt has prosecuted fewer trusts under that law than either of the three Presidents who preceded him. Says the former:

"Mr. Roosevelt's war on trusts has been oratorical; his Department of Justice has been less efficient than Mr. Cleveland's was. Under Harrison there were 47, under Cleveland 102, under McKinley 28, and under Roosevelt 27 prosecutions. Mr. Roosevelt, however, has had the advantage of the Elkins law, and Mr. Roosevelt's prosecutions under that and the interstate-commerce law aggregate 105 in six years, or three more than there were under Cleveland, under one law, in four years."

These are the facts, and yet Mr. Roosevelt gets all the credit. How does it happen? The only plausible explanation is that he is a most astute politician and advertiser. It is not mere blowing of trumpets and spectacular performance, in the ordinary sense, though there has been plenty of that. Mr. Roosevelt has a genius for doing ordinary things in a way to make them appear extraordinary, and for focussing admiring attention upon himself personally.

I have found this statement to be accurate, and it is borne out by a report from the Department of Justice, published on December 2, 1907, containing a list of cases decided during the Harrison Administration, from 1887 to 1893; during President Cleveland's second Administration, from 1893 to 1897; McKinley's Administration, from 1897 to 1901, and the Administration of President Roosevelt, from September 14, 1901, to the present time, to be found on page 12 of the report, as follows:

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE OF JANUARY 31.

I want to say something about the President's message of January 31. I will say first, however, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania in a very elegant and attractive way criticised the Supreme Court, especially the judges who are Democrats. I have here in my hand an article written by the President of the United States, then not the President of the United States, in 1896, in which he says: "Men that criticise the Supreme Court are guilty of a sort of atavism and a sort of modern degeneracy."

And while the gentleman may not be subject to be placed by the President in another unfavorable category, as he is accustomed to place others, when he criticised as he did even the Democratic members of the Supreme Court, he is certainly liable to come within the term of "atavist." I do not know that I would not rather be included in the Ananias Club than be termed an "atavist." [Laughter.]

I call attention to the following extract from the New York World to show how this remarkable message compares with some of the former views of the President:

[From the New York World.]

I again call your attention to the need of some action in connection with the abuse of injunctions in labor cases. * * *

This matter is daily becoming of graver importance, and I can not too urgently recommend that the Congress give careful consideration to the subject. If some way of remedying the abuses is not found the feeling of indignation against them among large numbers of our citizens will tend to grow so extreme as to produce a revolt against the whole use of the process of injunction. (From President Roosevelt's message to Congress January 31, 1908.)

If a judge is assailed for standing against popular folly, and above all, for standing against mob violence, all honorable men should rally instantly to his support. Nevertheless, if he clearly fails to do his duty by the public in dealing with lawbreaking corporations, lawbreaking men of wealth, he must expect to feel the weight of public opinion; and this is but right, for except in extreme cases this is the only way in which he can be reached at all. (From President Roosevelt's message.)

The apologists of successful dishonesty always disclaim against any effort to punish or prevent it on the ground that any such effort will "unsettle business." It is they, who, by their acts, have unsettled business; and the very men raising this cry spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in securing by speech, editorial, book, or pamphlet the defense by misstatements of what they have done; and yet when public servants correct their misstatements by telling the truth they declaim against them for breaking silence lest "values be depreciated." (From President Roosevelt's message.)

But if it were true that to cut rottenness from the body politic meant a momentary check to an unhealthy seeming prosperity, I should not for one moment hesitate to put the knife to the corruption. (From President Roosevelt's message.)

The men who object to what they style "government by injunction" are, as regards the essential principles of government, in hearty sympathy with their remote skin-clad ancestors who lived in caves, fought one another with stone-headed axes and ate the mammoth and woolly rhinoceros. They are interesting as representing a geological survival, but they are dangerous whenever there is the least chance of their making the principles of this age-buried past factors in our present life. (From "The Campaign of 1896," by Theodore Roosevelt, Review of Reviews, September, 1896.)

Furthermore, the Chicago convention attacked the Supreme Court. Again this represents a species of avatism—that is, of recurrence to the ways of thought of remote barbarian ancestors. Savages do not want an independent and upright judiciary. They want the judge to decide their way, and if he does not they want to behead him. (From "The Campaign of 1896," by Theodore Roosevelt.)

Mr. Watson's followers belong to that school of Southern Populists who believe that the respectable and commonplace people who own banks, railroads, dry goods stores, factories, and the like are persons with many of the mental and social attributes that unpleasantly distinguished Heliogabalus, Nero, Caliguia, and other worthies of later Rome. Not only do they believe this, but they say it with appalling frankness. They are very sincere as a rule, or at least the rank and file are. They are also very suspicious. (From "The Campaign of 1896," by Theodore Roosevelt.)

Mr. Watson would at a blow destroy all banks and bankers, with a cheerful, albeit vague, belief that thereby he was in some abstruse way benefiting the people at large. And he would do it with the simple sincerity and faith of an African savage who tries to benefit his tribe by a sufficiency of human sacrifice. (From "The Campaign of 1896," by Theodore Roosevelt.)

I place in parallel columns the following, one from the writings of Altgeld, the other from the President:

JOHN P. ALTGELD.

In all large industries accidents happen, laborers get crippled, crushed, killed. This means widows, orphans, poverty, and wretchedness. Justice requires that accidents should be charged up to the business, that those who are maimed should be cared for by those for whom they toiled. But no, the burden is generally loaded on the unfortunate.

The child, getting but a pittance for its long hours of toil, becomes weary and benumbed, and is caught in a machine and gets its arm crushed off. Does the proprietor pension it or provide for its future? No; he would send it home and put another in its place; if he was a very humane man he would probably pay the doctor's bill. He would argue that his employees were free agents; they come to his mill of their own free will and they must take their chances. He does not think how they are helping him to build up an enormous fortune without receiving a fair compensation in return, and that he is getting something for which no equivalent is given. (From the "Cost of Something for Nothing," by J. P. Altgeld.)

ROOSEVELT.

It is meet and fit that the apologist for corrupt wealth should oppose every effort to relieve weak and helpless people from crushing misfortune brought upon them by injury in the business from which they gain a bare livelihood.

The burden should be distributed. It is hypocritical baseness to speak of a girl who works in a factory where the dangerous machinery is unprotected as having the right "freely to contract to expose herself to danger to life and limb." She has no alternative but to suffer want or else expose herself to such dangers, and when she loses a hand or is otherwise maimed or disfigured for life, it is a moral wrong that the whole burden of the risk necessarily incidental to the business should be placed with crushing weight upon her weak shoulders, and all who profit by her work escape scot free.

This is what opponents of a just employers' liability law advocate, and it is consistent that they should usually also advocate immunity for those most dangerous members of the criminal class—the criminals of great wealth. (Message, January 31, 1908.)

The man who wrote these words from which the President seems to have, I will not say copied word for word, but as great and similar minds happen to agree and run in the same channel, the President in his message of the 31st of January gave utterance to the thoughts and words which in their nature had been written in the interest of the common workingman of Illinois. That man who wrote these words, and from which the President appears to have copied, if not the words then the ideas, is thus spoken of by Theodore Roosevelt in 1896:

I decline to regard Mr. Altgeld as an ordinary political offender and class him with all the other inciters of riot and mob violence as a dangerous foe to order and liberty, etc.

Altgeld is vindicated, though denounced as a man who would plunge the country into terrible riot and disturbance in 1896. The words which he wrote in his little book, The Cost of Something for Nothing, have found their way into the great message of the President, and to-day have been proclaimed by him and by the Republican party as a part of the doctrine for civic righteousness. [Loud applause.]

The most remarkable thing that presents itself to the student of present conditions is the fact that although the Democratic party is not in power, and has never been in control of all the branches of the Government since 1860, except for two years, and while the Republican party has had absolute control of legislation for the past twelve years, yet the principles contained in the Democratic platforms with reference to the great question of the day—the regulation of interstate commerce and of the great corporations engaged in it, the laws against trusts and combinations, and the laws in favor of giving labor its just rights and protection—have been forced upon the Republican party in Congress, and they have very reluctantly enacted some of them into law.

It is true that we had no power to enact law, but the contest waged by the Democratic party and its leaders for these rights of the people so awakened the interest of the people and the demand became so insistent that the Chief Executive who has occupied the White House during the past seven years, though a Republican, has been wiser than his party and has constantly demanded their enactment. Some of these propositions and principles were never acknowledged or sanctioned by the Republican party in its platforms; measures which their party pledges never promised to enact have nevertheless been enacted, and some others of like character are now being demanded by the Republican President.

Yet, a few years ago these same policies and principles were combated and denounced everywhere by Republicans, and sometimes by no one so severely as the President himself, who now insists that they shall be enacted into law.

This struggle for the rights of the people has always been long and tedious. The forces of riches and wealth yield very reluctantly the power which they have to control the masses and their labor. But the Anglo-Saxon has been noted in history, wherever he has been found, for his persistent assertion of the rights of the common people, and though the struggle has been apparently lost at times yet it generally succeeds. There was never a more instructive and attractive instance of this struggle of the masses against oppression than that of the people of England which led to the repeal of the corn laws, whereby the bread of the poor was taxed to enrich the lords and landholders. The struggle went on for many years; and finally when it was accomplished and the laws were repealed, Sir Robert Peel, the prime minister at that time, and who forced the passage of the law repealing the corn laws, was forced to retire. On the very night when the bill was passed and returned immediately by the House of Lords approved, he was defeated on an important measure by a combination of the landowners of the house, who were the beneficiaries of the corn laws and the opponents of the Government, and resigned. In retiring, he said:

I shall leave a name execrated by every monopolist, who from less honorable motives maintains protection for his own individual benefit; but it may be that I shall leave a name sometimes remembered with expressions of good will in those places which are the abode of men whose lot is to labor and to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow—a name remembered by expressions of good will, when they shall re-create their exhausted strength with abundant untaxed food, the sweeter because it is no longer leavened by a sense of injustice.

Years afterwards thousands of English workingmen, each bringing his small contribution, erected a monument to his memory and placed upon it the inscription:

He gave cheap bread to the poor of England.

So the Democratic party, though it has been retired from power, though it has had no power to enact laws, yet its leaders have constantly demanded the enactment of those laws which the Republicans to-day boast as their own work and of which they claim to be the authors. Time will demonstrate to whom the merit belongs. In after years, though the Democratic party should never again be intrusted with power to enact legislation; when the burdens of the Dingley tariff law shall have been lessened; when laws shall be perfected by which the interstate corporations transacting business so necessary and vital to the life of the nation shall be regulated and controlled so as to no longer be permitted to oppress the people; when trusts and combinations of all kinds—for all monopolies are odious to the English-speaking people, and have been for two hundred years or more; there are no good trusts; all are bad—shall have been brought under the ban of the law [loud applause]; when privileges are no longer granted to men because they are rich and powerful and denied to others because they are poor and weak; when liberty and law shall rule supreme; when the power of the General Government shall be exercised in its proper sphere to regulate and control national affairs, and when the States shall be left and not interfered with to enact and enforce their own laws over their own citizens; when we shall have, as was intended, a dual system of government and not a federation with all power centralized in the Government at Washington, then will the people who enjoy these great blessings which were intended for them by the founders of their magnificent system give due credit to that great party which has brought it to pass, and they will proclaim that the Democratic party gave industrial freedom and protection from monopoly and extortion and forced the perpetuation of our system of government, the grandest and most glorious ever conceived by the mind of man! [Loud and continued applause on the Democratic side.]

I desire to call attention to page 2, lines 22, 23, and a part of line 24, where there were some words stricken out. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to striking out the words and inserting certain words in place of the words stricken out, so that the words stricken out may be reinstated and another amendment made to the bill.

Ten thousand dollars of said amount, or as much thereof as may be necessary, for the investigation of oriental markets with a view to the extension of the American flour trade.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. For several years we had cotton specifically put in the bill, and it has finally gone out, and I think rightfully. There is no reason I can see why we should embody in the bill the particular articles to be investigated.

These agents are appointed to investigate all articles of commerce and report on them, so that the country will know just what the situation is. I think, now that we have gotten rid of the question of referring to cotton every time in the bill, the Senate had better not begin to take up other articles in place of it.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, the reason we have asked to have a flour investigation in the Orient is because of the fact that a provision was inserted for the investigation of the cotton products. The cotton products would not have been investigated and the Department would not have sent an agent to Europe if it had not been provided in express terms in the appropriation bill that an agent should be appointed for that purpose. Now that the agent has been appointed and the investigation has been made, trade in this commodity has increased materially.

So in this case the request comes from all the millers of the Pacific Coast States that this amount of money be appropriated for the purpose of investigating the flour conditions in the Orient. The Department now has an expert examining the conditions in reference to the sale of flour in Europe from the Middle West States, and the Pacific Coast States simply ask that in the interest of the trade we are desirous of obtaining in the Orient an investigation should be made by an agent of the Government for that particular purpose. If the item is not included in the bill in the words that we have set forth, the appropriation not being sufficient, they will not use the money for the particular purpose which we desire.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection myself to increasing the appropriation, but there is not any reason, it seems to me, why we should include flour or cotton or any other specific article in the bill requiring the investigation of that particular product as against all other products that are desired to be taken care of in commerce. I do not know how much good the Commission is doing, but it seems to me that it is doing some good, and the Department having it in charge can just as well be depended on to investigate flour as cotton or any other product. While the millers in my State are anxious about this appropriation, it seems to me, and it has seemed all the time, that there is no occasion why any specific article shall be inserted in the bill for investigation.

I am willing that the portion of the amendment that increases the appropriation to $50,000 shall be made; that is what it was last year; but I do not want the naming of any particular article for investigation.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee has referred to the fact that the cotton business has been omitted. I have an amendment which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is very anxious I should offer for him. I had no opportunity to converse with him, but he sent it to me with the request that I should offer it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that the pending amendment be disposed of, and then the Chair will recognize the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say, before the pending amendment is disposed of, that if it is not the policy of the Senate to have specific articles examined, I will not offer the amendment to reinstate the cotton investigation; if it is, I shall offer it.

I know very little about the cotton business, but I present it for the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TELLER. In a moment. I had no opportunity to converse with the Senator from South Carolina, who sent it by a friendly hand and asked me to offer it. I shall offer it if it is the policy to specifically indicate the product, and if not I shall feel at liberty not to offer it. I will now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to what I understand to be the fact—that cotton conditions are being inquired into by these agents without a specific provision therefor.

In view of the action of the Department heretofore and its purposed course for the future, I should not think it would be necessary to insert any specific reference to cotton.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CULBERSON. That is all I have to say.

Mr. WARREN. This matter was fully discussed a year ago. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] was, I understand, entirely satisfied with the assurances given him by the head of the Department that the cotton product would be properly inspected and examined under the appropriation.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator? It was my amendment that provided originally $50,000 for the cotton investigation. It went to the House of Representatives, and there seemed to be a great deal of objection there to designating any particular article. So they struck out cotton with the understanding that cotton should have a representative abroad.

I wish to say that by reason of that investigation and the work that is being done in cotton and cotton products there has been a great increase of trade, especially in cotton-seed oil. The trade has increased from $20,000,000 to forty-odd million dollars. If the Senator will strike out the word "flour" I think we ought to increase the appropriation to $50,000. That was the original appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. That is what I rose to suggest to the chairman in charge of the bill, to leave out the specific provision and put in such an enlargement of appropriation as has been suggested.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agreed to that last Congress. Although the bill three years ago had cotton in it, there was objection in the House, and they struck out the cotton appropriation, leaving the appropriation $40,000 or $50,000. This appropriation was reduced by the House to $35,000 and increased by the committee of the Senate to $40,000, the amount recommended. If we just add $10,000 and make it $50,000 instead of $40,000, it will accomplish what the Senator from California desires.

Mr. FLINT. Having obtained the expression from the Senate that this money would be used for that particular purpose, and the Department understanding that if the appropriation is raised to the amount of $50,000 the sum of $10,000 will be used for the purpose of investigating the flour conditions of the Orient, I will have no objection to the latter part of the amendment being stricken out and simply raise the amount of the appropriation from $40,000 to $50,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California modifies his amendment.

Mr. STONE. Let the amendment be reported as modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As modified, the amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 154, line 3, before the word "thousand," the committee proposes to strike out "thirty-five" and to insert "forty." The Senator from California proposes to amend by striking out "forty," the committee amendment, and inserting "fifty," so as to read:

For compensation at not more than $10 per day and actual necessary traveling expenses of special agents to investigate trade conditions abroad, with the object of promoting the foreign commerce of the United States, $50,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment of the committee, which has been already agreed to, will be regarded as open to amendment.

Mr. TELLER. After the expression by the Senator from Texas and the Senator from North Carolina, who know more about the cotton business than I do, I feel at liberty not to offer the amendment which I had expected to offer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. Now, I ask that the Senate allow the committee amendments to be finished before we go into general amendments of the bill. On page 121, the amendment incorporated in the bill, offered originally by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], ought now to be considered. It was passed over in the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 121, the Committee on Appropriations reported to insert the following paragraph at the top of the page:

For continuing the work authorized by the act approved March 3, 1891, and for the protection of the lives of miners in the Territories and in the district of Alaska, and for conducting such investigations in the Territories and in the district of Alaska as will increase safety and efficiency in mining, to be immediately available, $195,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to accept for use in the investigations named above any site, buildings, equipment, or fund which in his judgment it may be proper to accept; such acceptance shall be reported to Congress, and shall not be considered as binding the Government of the United States beyond the appropriation made by Congress in any one year.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I move an amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 5 of the amendment strike out the words "in the Territories and in the district of Alaska."

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, that will attempt to authorize the United States to investigate the mining condition in the States, which the committee determined it would not attempt to do, and which I will never myself agree shall be done.

I do not know that Pennsylvania has, but many of the States have their own laws with reference to mining matters. The State of Colorado has its laws, and has had for a good many years. We have never had any trouble in protecting the employees of the mining companies in that State. I deny the right of the United States to invade a State with even, perhaps I might say, its agents, without the approval of the State.

It has been suggested that the provision might be amended by saying that when the State authorities ask the United States to investigate the condition, it might be done. I believe I would not object to that, but I certainly will object to the amendment to the amendment as proposed, and I am sure it will not meet the approbation of the necessary vote in some other place, at least, to become a law.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. STONE. I desire to ask the Senator if the same thing he objects to has not been done by the Agricultural Department in the prosecution of its investigations?

Mr. TELLER. I would not undertake to say what the Agricultural Department has done. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. STONE. Have not investigations authorized by Congress been made by the Department of Agriculture along the lines to which the Senator now objects?

Mr. TELLER. I think not. I do not think there is any authority to interfere with the agriculture of a State, and this is an interference with the mining industry of the several States. If a State is not capable of taking care of its own affairs to the extent of seeing that its employees in the mines are protected and that proper care is taken in the mines, certainly the General Government is not able to do it any better than the States can do it.

I insist upon it that what is proposed here is a radical change, and I do not think the committee ought to accept it. If it is accepted, I shall reserve, as far as I am concerned, the right to object to it in every place where I can.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, if I shared the views of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], that the effect of this amendment would be to authorize any officer of the Federal Government to invade any State or to do anything within any State that was prohibited by the laws of the State in respect to its domestic affairs, I would not have offered this amendment to the amendment. The purpose of the amendment to which my amendment has been offered is to enable proper investigations to be made into the causes of mining disasters.

Mr. President, there is a very clear distinction between the power of the Federal Government to conduct investigations for any purpose that it may see fit and the power of the Federal Government to interfere with the operations of the proper functions of the State by legislation.

The Supreme Court has time and time again recognized that we can conduct investigations even where we can not legislate, and very frequently the Federal Government conducts investigations for the purpose of furnishing information to the people at large upon subjects of great importance. The statute books are filled with instances of this kind. We know that investigations have been conducted relative to the ravages of the gypsy moth in Massachusetts, the boll weevil in Texas, and that experimental stations have been established for investigation of agricultural, meteorological, and conditions affecting the general public.

In the investigations conducted by the Industrial Commission the whole range of human industry and endeavor was covered. Is the protection of human life of less importance than the protection of property? Now, I take it, if this bill becomes a law and the Secretary of the Interior, in pursuance of the authority herein prescribed, should call upon the owner of a mine in a State and undertake to assert any privileges in respect to the mine which would defeat any right that the owner of the mine might have under the law of the State, he could raise the question on the statute, although, in my own judgment, I think such investigations would be welcomed, because the benefits would be as wide as the nation itself, as wide, indeed, as the world.

I wish to call the Senate's attention to the fact that in European countries, where such investigations are conducted on scientific bases and the results of the investigations are made known to the industries particularly concerned, the loss of life in mining is trifling compared with the loss of life in this country. The fact is that in some sections of Europe, where mining is conducted on a large scale, the loss of life per thousand is less than one-fourth of what it is in the United States.

Mr. President, the loss of life and accidents in the United States far exceed those of any other country where the mining industry is being conducted. This proposed investigation is for the purpose of allowing the hundreds of thousands of men who toil in the darkness beneath the surface of the earth to get the benefit of all the protection that all the knowledge gathered from all possible sources will furnish.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President I have no doubt that the Government of the United States may make investigations, but I deny the right of the Government to interfere with any miner in the State of Colorado. I want to notify the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] that no country in Europe and no country in the world has escaped, as we have escaped in the State of Colorado, disasters in mines. We have all kinds of mines in Colorado, Mr. President, gold mines, silver mines, copper mines, manganese mines, iron mines, and coal mines. For years we have had a State supervision, a supervision that provides how the mines shall be kept open, what shall be the appliances and opportunities for escape, etc., and no country in the world has better provided against mining accidents than we have. We have never had any disasters to speak of in our State—never from faulty mining, though we have had occasionally from faulty machinery, but that was the fault of the operators and not the fault of the system.

Mr. President, I admit there has been a good deal of bad mining in this country, but the fault lies with the States, and the States alone can correct it. The United States can not do it and will not do it.

It has been suggested that we might insert here a provision that, with the consent of the States, investigations might be made in the mines. I did not myself think that was necessary, because I understood that without that, if the mine owner was willing to admit the investigators, they might make an investigation in mines as well as make an investigation in Washington, except that I did not think we should attempt to indicate that the Government should investigate a mine without the consent of the mine owner.

I do not think that there is any necessity for this proposed change. The most of this $195,000 is not to be expended for investigations, but is to be expended in experiments which we commenced four years ago, and for which we continued the appropriation two years ago. This is but a continuation of that, and only a small part of the amount will be spent in investigations at all events.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply desire to say a few words. I have given considerable study to the various mine disasters which have taken place in this country in recent years. In these investigations and studies one thing has especially impressed me, and it is that about which I wish to speak. The thing which has impressed me most in connection with these mine explosions is that no one in most of these disasters seems able to assign the cause for the explosion. This is especially true with respect to some most appalling mine disasters in recent years. I have before me the resolutions adopted on January 9 by the coal operatives of West Virginia and western Pennsylvania. I want to read a short extract from these resolutions.

Resolved, That at the present time we are at a total loss to account for many of these disasters which have occurred in the best-regulated mines in the country; such as have been regarded heretofore as absolutely safe by the owners and managers, who have spared no expense, and by the mine inspectors of the several States. * * *

Again, Mr. President, I have a part of the findings of the coroner's jury, which investigated the great Monongah coal-mine disaster in Fairmount, W. Va. I believe it was about the middle of last January that this coroner's jury held its session. The following is a part of their finding and recommendation:

There are many unsolved questions—

Say this jury—

connected with coal-mine disasters in the United States, and it is our recommendation that Congress make an appropriation for investigating the cause of these disasters, which are so destructive to life and to the resources of the country.

Some years ago in a little coal mine in North Carolina an accident happened, killing I think, about thirty persons. In that particular mine there have been three accidents, and the number of killed in those accidents, I believe, amounts to about seventy-five. I was slightly connected with the investigation of that case as an attorney, acting for a brother attorney whose business engagements prevented him from giving personal attention to the matter, and I remember distinctly that, with all the information that could be elicited from the operatives and owners of the mine, it was impossible to ascertain the cause of that accident. Of course, there are cases where these accidents are the result of carelessness, but in the majority of cases where there are accidents in these mines the cause of the accident remains unsolved.

In this condition of things, Mr. President, it seems to me that there is necessity for thorough, complete, and scientific investigation for the purpose of ascertaining the cause that lead to these fearful accidents and this great destruction of human life. The States, of course, have been devoting some attention to these inquiries, but we shall understand that these investigations, when left to the States, are never as thoroughly made as they can be made by the United States Government with its army of trained and scientific investigators.

Mr. President, as I understand it, all that is proposed by this amendment is an investigation—not legislation, but an investigation—in order that we may obtain proper information upon which to base such legislation as may be found to be competent on the part of the General Government, and such legislation as, in the light of that information, may be found to be necessary and proper on the part of the State.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] to amend the provision incorporated in the bill by the Committee on Appropriations raises a very old question. It comes to us in a many-sided way. In almost every field of human endeavor there have been attempts to regulate enterprises, industries, calamities, and losses by the Federal Government. We have done it, Mr. President, many a time, but we have done it over protest. In a case of this kind, where it is sought to extend the grasp of the General Government over industries in the States, I should have been glad to find with us the Senator from Pennsylvania, a most brilliant constitutional lawyer and a conservative by education and instinct. It may be a forlorn few who resist these repeated attempts of the General Government to stretch out its strong hand and regulate and control and investigate industries in the States—local industries, not industries that are a part of an intercommerce system between the States and from one State to another, but purely and essentially local—and I should have been glad to have found the Senator from Pennsylvania with us instead of against us; but I know that he has good reasons for his position, and no one can put them better than he can.

It is worth while, before the Senate does this, to see what is the history of legislation respecting investigation into mines. On March 3, 1891, Congress passed an act for the protection of the lives of miners in the Territories. That law is found in volume 26 of the Statutes, page 1104. Nobody thought of asking that it be extended to the States, some of which have complete and effective statutes covering the subject, such as those which, as has been explained by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], apply in his State. I do not know as to the State of Pennsylvania, but the Senator from that State can tell us. Certainly it would be remarkable if Pennsylvania has not got a body of statutes upon this very subject. I know certain States have. At the time the act to which I have referred was passed, not only did nobody claim that it should extend to the States or ask that it should extend to the States, but in passing that act for the protection of the lives of miners in the Territories—under our jurisdiction solely and being a part of the subject-matter that we do legislate upon—the bill itself, as a matter of precaution and recognizing that the Federal Government would not put out its hand to seek control in a case of that kind where a State had already legislated upon it, provided that the act should not be effective even where a Territory had so legislated. The last clause, section 19, of that act applicable to the Territories, which was put in wisely, because somebody had enough of a conservative spirit and a fear of Federal encroachment, provides:

That whenever any organized Territory shall make or has made provision by law for the safe operation of mines within such Territory, and the governor of such Territory shall certify said fact with a copy of the said law to the Secretary of the Interior, then and thereafter the provisions of this act shall no longer be enforced.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. We only have, I believe, two Territories—Arizona and New Mexico. Is it not true that both of those Territories have passed laws for the protection of miners? If so, how can we possibly, under the original amendment contained in the appropriation bill, spend $195,000 per year in Alaska? Of course, if Arizona and New Mexico have already adopted laws, they do not come under the provisions of the law which the Senator is reading, and consequently this entire appropriation would apply to Alaska.

Mr. HALE. Then, Mr. President, the answer is pat and apparent: Cut down your appropriation and only give money enough, if it can not apply in these two Territories, to apply in the district of Alaska, but do not seek to change the intent of Congress, as made clear in the original act, and depart from what was laid down then as a sound principle.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I was not making that suggestion as an argument in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HALE. No; I so understood.

Mr. CLAY. I was making the suggestion as an argument against the adoption of the original amendment——

Mr. HALE. Precisely.

Mr. CLAY. As it came from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. And, as I said, the answer to the Senator is—and he is in the same line of thought that I am—that if the original amendment carries more money than is needed, the remedy would be, instead of extending the grasp of the Federal Government to these things, to cut down the appropriation, so that if, under the section I have just read, it only applies to the district of Alaska, instead of spending $145,000 or $195,000, $25,000 would be ample.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, to see if I have a right view of this amendment? As I understand, even if the amendment as it came from the committee should be supplemented by the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and be agreed to, the law would still only permit action by the Federal Government for the protection of miners in the Territories. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania would simply authorize an investigation into the condition of miners anywhere. It would simply authorize an universal investigation, or an investigation wherever it could be best conducted, to ascertain the causes that lead up to these tragedies, and hence would not interfere with the law from which the Senator from Maine has been quoting.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has the idea exactly. I should like, however, to put the proposition in just a little different form. There is a Federal purpose here. It is recited in the act to which the Senator from Maine has just referred. That Federal purpose is the protection of the lives of the miners in the Territories and in Alaska, over which we have unquestioned jurisdiction. The bill as it comes from the committee limits the investigations for that Federal purpose to the Territories within which the miners live whose lives are intended to be protected, and my amendment is designed to allow the investigation to be conducted at any place where information can be obtained that can be used for the protection of miners.

Not for one moment could I take the view suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], that this amendment is intended to allow the Secretary of the Interior or any of his agents to invade the State of Pennsylvania and prescribe what shall be done in the mines of Pennsylvania—which are domestic enterprises, wholly and exclusively under the authority of that State. I would not for an instant stand for such a proposition. But I say that investigations can be made, and the public may be given the benefit of their result, and if, as a result of such investigations, the mine owners of my State get information that will enable them to adopt more modern or safer methods, or to resort to more scientific expedients to improve the conditions as they now exist, to the end that disasters may be averted, we ought to be only too glad to furnish the means for obtaining such information.

We have investigations now and experimental stations and make appropriations running into the millions for the protection of the crops of the country and in order that the people may have knowledge about agricultural affairs.

Mr. President, is the protection of human life beyond our jurisdiction? Is it more important to spend our money to promote the agriculture of the country than it is to safeguard the lives of citizens? In the last year in the States of West Virginia and Pennsylvania, in the Territory of New Mexico, and elsewhere in the United States 9,000 men have been killed and wounded in mine explosions. All I ask is, let us get all the information possible upon the subject from whatever source we can, in order that mines may be conducted more intelligently and more safely. Let us not commit the absurdity of pretending to protect the lives of miners who are employed in Territories over which the United States has jurisdiction through investigations which are excluded from entering the field where the most valuable information is available.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania is traveling the same old road that some of us have seen traveled for years—the gradual encroachment of the Federal Government under the guise of investigating. There is not a single field that is occupied and controlled in the States by the National Government where the inception for such movement has not been the calling for an investigation. Why, Mr. President, that is at the foundation of the whole doctrine—if there is anything left of it—that the States shall regulate certain matters. When you declare that the General Government shall investigate them, you have admitted a jurisdiction that has no limit, and will have none. You can not investigate into mining disasters in Pennsylvania or in Ohio or in Illinois, and report upon them, that the next thing will not be to ask for legislation to restrict and control these monstrous evils. The 10,000 accidents which have taken place—which are melancholy, which are to be lamented—from the eloquent lips of the Senator from Pennsylvania would speak with double force when he asks that, as the Government has investigated and found certain wrongs which the State does not right, the Government shall right them. There is no difference fundamentally——

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission——

Mr. HALE. I say there is no difference fundamentally——

Mr. CLAY. I will not interrupt the Senator if it is not agreeable to him.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has thrown me off from my line of thought.

Mr. CLAY. I did not know the Senator could be thrown off.

Mr. HALE. I was saying, Mr. President, that investigation is the inception of every step taken by the Government to interfere with the States. It has always been so. As I was saying, I think that every argument for investigation would have double the strength when you have laid the foundation and proven the evil by the action of the Federal Government for legislation to cure the evil.

Mr. President, mining accidents, the horrors of the explosion, the filling of the shafts and vaults, the burial of scores, and, in some cases, hundreds of miners, appeal most powerfully to the imagination. Men say at once, "Something ought to be done," and when something ought to be done, the fashion of late years is to say that the Federal Government ought to do it. But, Mr. President, there are other things that we must investigate if we investigate mining accidents in States that have laws regulating mines.

The Senator says that what causes these explosions is a mystery, and nobody has ever been able, in many cases, to detect the underlying fundamental cause. Therefore the Government must try its hand. What are you going to do, Mr. President, with that immense domain of the destruction of property and human life in the monstrous holocausts that occur from great fires, and where the question of what caused the fires, whether it appeals to the public or to the investigators and adjusters of the insurance companies, is in nine cases out of ten the profoundest of mysteries? Therefore the Federal Government should inquire into the origin of these calamitous, these disastrous, fires, because they destroy human life, they make away with property, their cause is a mystery, and no system of State laws will do the work. There is not a State that has not got a thoroughly well-conducted system of investigation and supervision over fires and insurance companies, and there never has been a State that has been able under such a system to find the cause in hundreds of cases of these great fires.

I remember well of a fire occurring near where I live; and it was a fire of some magnitude. The adjuster came to my house and talked with me about it. It was a most interesting conversation. He said:

> I have been in this business twenty years for these great companies investigating into the causes of fires. I am treading upon profound and undiscoverable mysteries that lie at the bottom of these fires, and we are never able to penetrate them.

And therefore the Federal Government ought to take hold and try to find the causes of these disastrous fires.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. It is merely to ask a question. Suppose there was a series of mysterious and unaccountable fires in the District of Columbia, and Congress should order an investigation into their causes; would the Senator have any objection to the investigators goving over into New York and Pennsylvania and inquiring into similar conditions there? The object is the same.

Mr. HALE. The Senator answers his own question. We can investigate it in the District of Columbia; we are the only power that can legislate for the District of Columbia; but when you step over the boundary and invade Maryland and invade Virginia, and reach out the strong hand of the Government to investigate what we undoubtedly could and ought to investigate in the District of Columbia, you have torn down State lines.

I do not know, Mr. President, that it is useful or that it accomplishes anything to make any resistance against this breaking down of State lines. I do not know but that they are all to disappear before the resistless tide of Federal aggression. I do not know but that the demarcations which the fathers established, and that some of us believe in and want to maintain and perpetuate, are to disappear like the shifting sand before the rush of the incoming waves of the mighty sea. I am afraid they are.

I would, whenever the occasion arises, as it does here, enter my protest, and I hope the Senate will think twice. The committee has reported an amendment, following the spirit of the act of 1891, limiting it to the Territories. We were asked to extend it to the States, and the committee declined. It is a conservative committee; North and South and East and West are represented upon it; but the committee did not think that we ought to depart from the spirit and scope of the original act, and it is only invoked now by the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has given us what to him are good reasons. The fact that he, of all Senators, a Senator upon whom I should have depended, should lead this movement has brought me to my feet. Et tu, Brute!

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President, there is good reason why the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] should move to amend this bill so as to make the appropriation available for investigation of mine accidents in the States instead of limiting it to the Territories, and I can not understand why the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] can not see the difference between this proposition and the proposition he describes. Agriculture and mining are the two great basic industries producing the raw materials which are the foundation of the nation's life and industries. For agriculture, the Government has established and supports schools and colleges in every State and Territory. It has established a national department with eight or ten separate bureaus, and now expends about $12,000,000 annually in investigations looking to the betterment of every branch of agricultural industry.

For mining, the other of these two basic industries, the Government has until now done little. But this underground work is becoming more and more complex as the mines grow deeper, with danger and risk from causes not understood and conditions which produce more frequent accidents and more deplorable disasters to the men engaged. The method of production, manufacture, and marketing the mineral resources with a view to their more economic utilization, has received but little benefit or encouragement from Federal investigation or research.

I am proud of the great work done by the Department of Agriculture in enabling the farmer of the country to get the best result for his labor. And I also think that the 800,000 men who work underground, with its attendant dangers and discomforts, producing materials which feed the nation's industries, are entitled to the same help from the Government in the way of education and investigation as is being received by those who labor in the sunshine and safety of the farm.

I have not heard the distinguished Senator from Maine, when the bill from the Committee on Agriculture was reported to this body, complain that we were breaking down State lines by teaching the farmers in the various States of the Union how to farm.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Then the Senator has not been here in past years, for I have made myself very uncomfortable and unacceptable to the Committee on Agriculture in opposing the divers encroachments by the Federal Government upon the State domain. I have done it early and late, until I have recognized myself that I have become a sort of nuisance to the people who want to do these things. I have never consented to them, and have opposed them, and generally have been beaten.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I may not have been in attendance when the distinguished Senator made his objections to the agricultural bill, but I know there are many items in that bill which neither the Senator from Maine nor any other Senator upon this floor has objected to in the last ten years, and not one of them has any more merit than the item presented by this amendment.

Let us see what has been happening. For the last few years mine accidents in the various parts of the country have been increasing at a most disastrous rate. In Indiana alone, in 1907, 53 men lost their lives in the coal mines and 461 were seriously injured. In the entire country, in 1906, 2,061 were killed and 4,800 injured. This record, when compared with that of European countries, shows that we are killing three times as many men per 1,000 employed as they are.

And the sad part of all this is that these accidents are increasing in number and severity. The death list for 1907, from the figures now available, will reach 3,000, an increase of 1,000 deaths over the previous year, or 50 per cent. Part of this increase, of course, is due to the four shocking disasters of last December, costing the lives of fully 700 men; but without these disasters, the country shows an increase in the number of men killed, perhaps 25 per cent.

I am told that we have mined practically all of our easy coal and that in the future we will have to go deeper for our fuel. Deeper mines mean more dangerous mines and more horrors, unless we do something to stop them. Until the governments of Europe took up this question their coal mines were killing as many as we are now. These countries were shocked into finding a remedy, until now the accidents from gas and dust explosions have been reduced to a minimum. If Europe can do this, surely the United States can.

We can not have it said that the most progressive country in the world is behind Europe in the protection of the lives of men who toil under the earth.

The following figures indicate further the situation. Number of men killed for each 1,000 employed—averages for five years:

France (1901–1905)	0.91
Belgium (1902–1906)	1.00
Great Britain (1902–1906)	1.28
Prussia (1900–1904)	2.06
United States (1902–1906)	3.39

In 1890, 701 more men were killed in the mines than were killed on the railroads during that year. In the last sixteen years 22,840 lives were lost in the mines of the United States. Does it not seem that it is time that we were making an effort to determine the cause of this great loss of life with a view of finding a remedy?

The distinguished Senator from Maine would have the Senate believe that this is an effort to regulate a great industry in some of the States. That is not the purpose of the amendment. The appropriation proposed provides only for a general investigation and inquiries, which have for their chief purpose the prevention of accidents and the waste of mineral resources. The information gained thereby is to be published and distributed with a view to the betterment of the mining industry. The appropriation carries no authority looking to Federal supervision or inspection of mines. All such inspection work is a matter for the States. The work of the Government along these lines will be purely educational. The results of the investigation will become most directly beneficial in that they will serve as a correct basis for intelligent and effective legislation in the various States, and coming from this impartial and disinterested source will also be acceptable as a basis of intelligent regulation and agreement between the operators and the miners.

I sincerely hope that the Senate will adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I fought for it in the committee. The amendment I introduced provided for an appropriation of $195,000 for the purpose of making investigations wherever it was necessary to make them. My amendment was adopted by the committee, but they limited investigation to the Territories. I said then, as I now say, that I do not believe it ought to be confined to the Territories alone.

The enormous loss of life is sufficient reason for the appropriation of this $195,000, but there is still another factor in the problem, and one that is fraught with much importance to the country. The mining industry presents for consideration a serious national problem. During 1907 the coal produced in the United States was 450,000,000 tons. The waste which resulted, with our present mining methods, in getting this coal out of the ground, amount to as much as the entire production. With improved mining methods at least one-half of this enormous yearly loss is believed to be easily preventable. This coal is worth at least $1 a ton, or $225,000,000 loss to the country in one year.

At the present increasing rate of mining and waste the best part of the nation's fuel supply will be exhausted within the next century; and meanwhile, within the next two or three decades, the cost of coal to the manufacturers of the country will be at least double that at the present time.

A few years ago, when the cotton-boll weevil appeared in the Southern States, we appropriated, if I remember correctly, a half million dollars, and I believe that appropriation was all right. It was a plague coming upon the cotton crop. The States could not control it. They did not know how to get at it, and we gave an appropriation to carry on an investigation to discover means of destroying the boll weevil. No lives were involved there. It was simply an investigation to try to aid the States in the protection of property.

Again, for the New England States we gave an appropriation of something like a quarter million dollars to destroy the gypsy moth or to ascertain how to destroy it. No lives were at stake in this case. It was only a question of protecting property. In view of the long list of precedents where Congress has made appropriations for investigations purely where property interests were at stake, certainly in this instance, where not only property but life is at stake, the Congress of the United States can afford to make this small appropriation.

The Senator from Maine says that this is not a matter of interstate interest. If the coal supply of the country is not a matter of interstate interest, what can be? Our great industries can not run without the fuel that is dug out of the mines; and certainly if there is any one industry in the country which affects all of the people of the United States, it is the mining industry, which furnishes the fuel in the homes and in the factories which produce the articles of interstate commerce.

Mr. President, I think I have been fairly conservative as to appropriation bills. Before I came to this body I had something like ten years' service in connection with appropriation bills elsewhere. I do not believe anybody ever charged me with being reckless in handling those bills, and I am not reckless when I ask the Senate to assist this great industry which affects us all, where life is being lost at an enormous rate, where the country is losing millions of dollars annually through waste, and authorize the investigation proposed. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania is adopted, then the original language of my amendment as originally drafted is restored in the form in which I think it should pass.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, ordinarily I have very great sympathy with the views of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] as expressed, and the desire as manifested, to keep the Federal Government fairly within the range of its legitimate functions. We have had all sorts of experimental work presented for our consideration, and the latest is not more extravagant than some that have gone before. A gentleman suggested that the naturalists had announced, and doubtless correctly, that the birds have not improved their nests in a thousand years; that they were manifestly uninformed of the advance of modern science, and that something should be done in the way of preparing legislation to enable the birds to improve their nests. We have ventured upon many a field quite as impracticable as arranging for the improvement of birds' nests.

But, Mr. President, this, to my mind, is not a departure to be classified in that category. The act of 1891 originated in a committee of the House, of which I happened at the time to be chairman, and I had something to do with the framing of the bill and with its passage through the House. We met with much opposition at that time, because there was very little coal mining in the Territories. A portion of the country now embraced within the great State of Oklahoma was the only coal-producing region in the Territories at that time. The bill was prepared to protect the lives of miners in that region and in such other regions as might later develop coal measures. It has worked fairly well, but it is far from being a thoroughly effective law. That it should be amended in the light of experience goes without saying.

The purpose of the clause of the bill under consideration is to enable the Congress to secure the information upon which to predicate needed amendments. It does not propose the creation of a system of laws to extend over any State of the Union, but only over the Territories and the district of Alaska. It will be borne in mind that the poorest developed, the most recently discovered, and probably the least equipped of the coal mines of the country are to be found in the Territories. The bill, as reported from the committee, would confine the investigation or the ascertainment of needed facts to the poorest equipped and the least developed of all the coal mines in the whole of the jurisdiction.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] suggests that, owing to the efficiency of the Colorado law and the administration thereof, the loss of life in the mines of Colorado is less than in any other State in the Union. May we not with propriety inquire into the high efficiency there reached, for the purpose of better informing ourselves as to our duty to the Territories? The mines of Pennsylvania are the deepest of all mines thus far developed. Must we stop at the line of Pennsylvania in quest of information because, forsooth, we may by making that inquiry invade the rights of a State?

The Senator from Maine suggests that great fires occur, those visitations coming to all sections of the country. Would he deprive the District of Columbia, in quest of good fire apparatus, of the privilege of going to Baltimore to examine fire engines or to New York for the purpose of looking up hooks and ladders and equipment in use and found serviceable there? Upon the same principle as that suggested in opposition to this amendment that objection would be raised.

The Senator from Indiana suggests that we have made investigations with reference to the boll weevil. The Senator from Maine would confine investigations as to the boll weevil to the Territories over which we have exclusive jurisdiction, and when Mr. Boll Weevil got up to the State line the investigator would have to let him go on his way without any further investigation at all. Whenever the gypsy moth reached the line of a State he would be free from further interference by the Federal inspector or scientific man, because, forsooth, if he observed him any further we might invade the rights of the States.

Now, in this particular case it is of supreme importance that the best thought of the country on the subject of safety in mining, particularly for coal, shall be at the disposal of Congress. I should like to see this national law, as applied to Territories, made a model law which might with justice and with profit to the States be adopted by them all. If we confine, as the bill does, the investigation to the Territories and to the district of Alaska, we will get little or no information. Probably all the information obtainable in the district of Alaska and the Territories is now on file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior or one of his bureaus. What we do need in order to legislate intelligently for the Territories is knowledge which can be obtained only by a wide range of investigation; and the Senator from Pennsylvania has performed a service for the Senate, I think, in moving to strike out the words "in the Territories and in the district of Alaska," and that, be it known, is all the amendment proposes, and those words are only stricken out in connection with the direction to investigate. Let me read the amendment as it now reads and as it would read if the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania were adopted. This item is:

> For continuing the work authorized by the act approved March 3, 1891, and for the protection of the lives of miners in the Territories and in the district of Alaska, and for conducting such investigations in the Territories and in the district of Alaska as will increase safety and efficiency in mining.

The Senator proposes to strike out "in the Territories and in the district of Alaska," so that it will read "and for conducting such investigations as will increase safety and efficiency in mining," be the mining conducted where it may, within the jurisdiction of the country or anywhere else in the world.

I think the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania should be adopted, and if it is not adopted, this proposal to make an appropriation for an investigation confined to Alaska and the Territories should be stricken out, because it will be fruitless and futile, as we have on hand all the information which could be elicited by any such investigation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word. I do not suppose there is any Senator who will accuse me of being indifferent to the question of the encroachment by the Federal Government upon States rights or privileges or prerogatives. I do not think the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] involves that question. If I did, I should be very cautious in giving it my support. I think it is wide of that question. The presentation made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] so correctly states my views that I do not think it necessary to repeat in any measure what he has said. I think it relates simply to an investigation, and as has been very clearly stated by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] it relates to a matter entirely corresponding to a good many things as to which we have made investigations relating to different industries; one in which I think we can proceed without danger of the encroachment which has been suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. Of course I am very glad to welcome expressions such as made by the Senator from Maine as to the great importance of preserving the line of authority and jurisdiction between our different sovereignties, I may say, the different governments represented in our dual system.

I simply rose, Mr. President, to make one remark in that connection, and that is that the striking out of these words does not relate to the States in any way. It does not say that they shall go into the States. It does not have special reference to the States. It is true, I suppose, that most of the investigation will be made within the United States, but with the words stricken out the investigation can be made in England just as well as it can in the United States. In other words, it simply releases those who are charged with the investigation from the necessity to confine their investigations to the Territories and turns them loose to seek the information wherever it may be found, either in this country or in any other country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to give my adherence to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In Oklahoma we have had many most serious accidents in coal mines. I do not regard this amendment as invading in any degree the rights of any State any more than the Weather Bureau invades the rights of the States of the Union. We have this information with regard to the weather, obtained by stations from one end of the country to the other, for the information and for the welfare of the people of the United States. There is only one point in the proposed amendment, and that is as to where these investigations shall be made. The original act confined the investigations to New Mexico, Arizona, and Alaska. This amendment leaves those investigations to be made wherever it may be found profitable and wise.

The fuel bill of the United States amounts to about sixteen hundred million dollars. The output of coal amounts to 450,000,000 tons per annum. The waste in the mines of the United States amounts to nearly 400,000,000 tons, a matter of very great national importance; and while the purpose of the original act is to protect the lives of the miners and to promote their welfare in the Territories, when this information shall have been gathered together it will serve a most useful purpose in protecting the lives of miners throughout the United States, because that knowledge will be available for every State in the Union.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that last year there were 9,000 persons killed or wounded in the mines. This is a very important national matter, affecting the life of our citizens and affecting the conservation of our natural resources in coal and fuel. Therefore, I think the need is apparent, and that the Government ought not to be confined in its investigation to the limited area of the Territories, but that it should be at liberty to make inquiry wherever it may be, for the purpose of getting the information necessary for the use not only of the Government in the Territories, but for the use of the different States in the Union.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, until the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] had spoken I had intended to occupy one or two minutes of the Senate's time in commenting upon the statement of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]; but since the Senator from Georgia, that sleepless and most watchful sentinel upon the ramparts of States rights, sees no peril in this investigation, I suppose it is not very necessary for any person who advocates this most humane appropriation to say anything further.

Of course it may occur, even to the Senator from Maine, and to every other Senator, no matter what his views may be upon the proper functions of the State and Federal governments, that we now have and for many years have had appropriations for the Department of Commerce and Labor to enable it to send special investigators to foreign countries to investigate manufacturing, to investigate many things that concern the commercial development of those countries which are our rivals, and to maintain that we may make such an appropriation for such an investigation in foreign countries and yet can not make an appropriation for a more necessary investigation in our country is a contradiction in terms.

It has been pointed out, and it is not necessary for me to repeat, although I have the laws here—the appropriation law of last year and the one for the year before that—that this has been the uniform practice; and when the Senator from Maine said that there never had been a time when one of these appropriations was proposed that he had not resisted it, even if it was necessary to stand single-handed and alone, like Horatio at the bridge, I had almost asked him whether or not, when an appropriation was proposed to investigate the ravages of the gypsy moth in New England, to which my colleague called attention, he had been watching for the dangerous encroachments of the Federal power. I do not think the records will dislose it.

Nor has any Senator from the other section of the country been found to resist the appropriations to investigate and stop the ravages of the boll weevil. It was at that time their own crops which were imperiled by the boll weevil in the South, just as the trees and crops of New England were imperiled by the gypsy moth in the North. Then we have investigated the injury wrought by cattle ticks; we have provided for the inspection of guaranteed cattle; we sent physicians to investigate the yellow-fever mosquito in New Orleans, and nobody discovered Federal encroachment in any of them. We have not attacked agricultural experiment stations in States and many other things.

So, Mr. President, it becomes clear to all of us even on half of a second thought that the danger of "Federal encroachment" largely depends upon whose ox is gored. But this is an evil that is not confined to Texas, like the boll weevil, nor to New England like the gypsy moth. It affects the entire Republic. It not alone concerns property; it does concern property, but also it concerns human life as well.

Does anything more need to be said than that if, without objection, we made appropriations to send special agents to every European country that is our rival to investigate manufacturing there, to investigate every form of commercial activity, we surely can do the same thing in our own country?

I had wondered when the Senator from Maine turned so pathetically to the Senator from Pennsylvania, regretting his apostacy to what he regarded as a mutual platform of conservatism, and said "Et tu, Brute," that he did not add the remainder of the quotation and say: "Then fall Cæsar." [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I assume that if this amendment is to be adopted it will become a law under one of the granted powers contained in the Constitution. I favor the amendment, and I must confess that I was somewhat surprised to find that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] favored it. The other day when I was urging upon this floor the proposition that State banks are engaged in interstate commerce just as State railroads are, that interstate exchange is a part of interstate commerce just as interstate transportation is, that if under the granted powers regarding interstate commerce Congress could take hold of a State railroad and apply safety appliances, it could also take hold of a State bank and apply the safety appliances of an adequate reserve and a sufficient capital, I was met by the Senator from Georgia with the question as to what there was in the whole range of legislation that I would not include within the interstate-commerce power of the Constitution. Now I assume——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator, in reply——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator a question, if I do not interfere with him. Is there anything the Senator would not include in the power of the Government to regulate interstate commerce?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is the question the Senator from Georgia asked me the other day, and I was alluding to it.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator would answer it now.

Mr. BACON. I want the Senator to state the answer which he gave at that time. I will state it now, with his permission.

The Senator said it would take too long to state, and I replied that I thought from what I had heard from the Senator he could state it in about one word—possibly not even one single thing.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I beg to differ from the Senator from Georgia regarding that. There are a great many things that are not included in the interstate-commerce power of the Constitution, but there are two things that are to my mind obviously included: One is interstate transportation and the other is interstate exchange.

But the purpose of my rising was not to elaborate an argument upon what the Senator regards as my favorite grant, the granted powers of the Constitution, but to state that doubtless the Senator from Georgia, in upholding this power to make investigations regarding the mining conditions of the country, relies upon one of the powers granted in the Constitution to the Federal Government or necessarily implied in the grant.

I assume, therefore, that he relies upon that provision of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to levy taxes and to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare of the United States. Assuming, therefore, that the Senator from Georgia relies upon the general-welfare clause of the Constitution for the power which enables him to give his sanction to this measure, I will ask the Senator from Georgia what there is in the whole range of legislation that he can not include and does not include within the general-welfare clause of the Constitution?

Mr. BACON. I suppose the Senator in charge of the bill will hardly be content that we should enter upon such a wide discussion as that; and in order that we may not go outside of the proper limit on this occasion, I will say it is not necessary even to go to the clause of the Constitution to which the Senator has alluded to justify this legislation.

The only extent to which it is necessary for us to go is that we are charged with the responsibility of seeing that the Territories are properly governed and their interests properly cared for, and this is specifically based upon the intention to correct evils in the Territories. We are certainly at liberty to go the world-wide round to seek whatever information we may find necessary in order to guarantee and secure that protection in the Territories.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Georgia, then, allow me to make a further inquiry? Assuming that the power upon which he relies for this investigation is not the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, but that clause of the Constitution which gives us control over the Territories of the United States, I will ask him whether, if the existing Territories become States, he would then deem it entirely within the power of the United States Government to enter upon this field of inquiry and investigation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am reluctant to consume the time of the Senate in the purely academic discussion to which the Senator invites me. I will simply answer, however, in the negative; that I would not deem it beyond the power of the Government.

In response to the Senator's other question, I shall content myself with saying—because I think it would be an imposition on the Senate to pursue the matter—that, so far as the general-welfare clause is concerned, it is with that as it is with a great many other powers in the Constitution where discretion must necessarily be exercised, and that the framers of the Constitution depended upon the fact that those who would exercise that discretion would do it wisely and conservatively, and not abuse the powers which necessarily were confided to them in that regard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCOTT in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is an amendment now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment is in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. On page 3, lines 22 and 23, I move to strike out the words "one thousand six hundred dollars," and to insert in lieu thereof "two thousand dollars." That pertains to the salary of the assistant in the document room of the Senate. He has been twelve years in that position, and recently because of the death of the chief of the room it became proper to advance some of the employees to the position of chief and first assistant, and notwithstanding the fact that this man has been there twelve years another assistant was advanced over his head.

We have increased the pay of the chief of the room to $3,000, and we have given one of the assistants who has been there seven years $2,000. This amendment proposes to put these two assistants on exactly the same footing and to pay them the same salary.

Mr. TELLER. May I ask that the amendment be read? I do not understand what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho proposes an amendment, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 22, after the words "assistant in the document room," strike out "one thousand six hundred" and insert in lieu "two thousand," so as to read:

Assistant in document room, $2,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. That gives exactly the same pay to the two assistants in the document room. They perform the same duties and have exactly the same responsibility, and it would seem manifestly unfair to advance one of them to $2,000 and then let the other one, who has been there nearly double the length of time, remain at $1,600.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Does this cover the case of that most valuable public servant, Mr. Llewellyn——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Whom some of us have known for years and who is a wheel horse in that Department? I hope the Senator's amendment, if it covers that case, will pass.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment is intended to cover the case of Mr. Llewellyn and to advance his salary as we have advanced the salary of his associate, who performs the same duties. I think the amendment should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the committee amendments have been finished——

Mr. HEMENWAY. There are one or two other committee amendments, if the Senator will permit them to be acted upon.

On page 152, line 2, I move to strike out "four thousand five hundred" and to insert "five thousand," so as to read:

For Solicitor of the Treasury, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEMENWAY. In line 13, on the same page, I move to strike out "$4,500" and to insert in lieu "$5,000," so as to read:

For Solicitor of the Department of Commerce and Labor, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEMENWAY. On page 52, line 17, in the items for office of Auditor for Post-Office Department, after the words "two thousand," where it occurs the last time, I move to insert "five hundred," so as to read:

Law clerk, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I believe authority has been granted to correct totals.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; that was given.

Mr. FRYE. It has been granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). That authority has already been granted.

Mr. DIXON. I offer an amendment. On page 6, line 5, after the words "United States," I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 5, after the word "United States," insert:

To Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service;
Expenditures in the Department of Justice;
Fisheries;
Standards, Weights, and Measures;
Expenditures in the Navy Department;
Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture;
Investigate the Condition of the Potomac River Front at Washington;
Expenditures in the Interior Department;
Investigate Trespasses on Indian Lands;
Expenditures in the War Department;
Irrigation;
National Banks, and Industrial Expositions.

Also, strike out, in lines 11 and 12, page 6, the words "thirty-eight thousand eight hundred and twenty" and insert in lieu thereof "forty-four thousand two hundred and eighty."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is always an ungracious thing for a man who desires to pay liberal salaries himself to his employees, who desires to aid in the payment of full salaries to the employees of the Government, to object to any raise of salaries. But there is always a time and place when it is best to do these things. I do not believe and the committee does not believe that the present is the time nor that just here now is the place.

Consideration of this in subcommittee and consideration of it in full committee was had, and it was decided that inasmuch as there were a great many changes in salaries to make and changes to make also in the way that the salaries are carried, the roll upon which they are carried, etc., and in view of the new Senate Building just approaching completion, it were better to leave those matters until we assembled next fall at the short session, when we would immediately take up the entire matter of the clerical force of the Senate and make such additions as seemed necessary to provide for the new building and to make such increase in salaries as the Senate might deem proper to make.

In my judgment the amendment at this time is out of order, and I shall feel constrained to make the point of order. It is legislation changing salaries. I dislike to do it, because my theory has always been to pay good salaries. I have been, I think, rather chided by my fellow-committeemen and by members of the Senate because I was more liberal, perhaps, than others.

I fully believe that this matter will be regulated to the satisfaction of the Senate and to the satisfaction of the employees—done logically, done properly—not later than our next meeting, when we shall take up the matter of the new building and of the entire list and all the rolls upon which they are carried, and so forth. I therefore feel compelled to raise the point of order on the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. DIXON. I hope the Senator from Wyoming will reserve his point of order temporarily.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; I will reserve it for any remarks the Senator may wish to make.

Mr. DIXON. I certainly want to give notice at this time that if a point of order is made against the increase proposed in this amendment, I shall in conscience bound feel it my duty to reserve the point of order against some of the other raises which the committee have seen proper to put into the bill.

Mr. President, it has been——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that a point of order would not lie, under the rule, against raises that were reported from the committee.

Mr. DIXON. I will say to the Senator from Indiana, with due deference to his suggestion, that from a painstaking research, made by myself and fortified by Senators in this Chamber who have had much longer service than I have had, I beg leave to differ with him very much on that proposition.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I did not know that the Senator had looked into the matter. I am very sure that when the Chair comes to rule, if he follows the rules of the Senate he will determine against the distinguished Senator's opinion, because the rules do not leave it open to question at all, but provide—I leave out a great deal in the reading—or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

Any amendment reported from a standing or select committee is in order under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. As a matter of fact, to amend an appropriation bill on the floor of the Senate, the question comes up whether these raises have been estimated for. Of course these have not been estimated for. The question arises, Have they been reported favorably by any committee? They have not. The question again arises whether it is new legislation, changing the law. This proposed amendment does that. So, in fact, there are three or four distinct counts upon which a point of order can be made.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes. I will read the rule further:

Or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

So any raise that was estimated for is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I had started to say it was with feeling of hesitancy that I offered this amendment, and had it not been for a full feeling of the great inequalities of the bill as reported by the committee as applied to the pay of clerks of all Senate committees, and as being out of proportion with the service rendered in different places, I would not have offered the amendment which the Secretary has just read.

In the first place, with all due respect to the two Senators who have just spoken, I want to call the Senate's attention at this time to the committee amendments, and I ask whether it be equity or whether it be right. I submit to the candid judgment of the Senate the two amendments on page 6 especially, where the committee have on their own motion raised the pay of the clerks to the Committees on Expenditures of the State Department, on Canadian Relations, and on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard from the salary now paid to the clerks to the other committees sought to be raised by this amendment to $2,220 per annum. I submit to the Senate that the two or three committees which are raised by the committee in this bill are of no more importance to the Senate and they have no more bills referred to them for consideration than the committees enumerated in the amendments which I have just offered.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. DIXON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator probably states a fact as to the importance of those committees compared with others.

Mr. DIXON. Then I would——

Mr. WARREN. One moment further, please.

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. This matter has come up very often before the Committee on Appropriations, and whether right or wrong, I personally have believed that every one of the Senators on this floor should have one man, a chief clerk, worth considerably more than what we are paying to the clerks of committees, who receive either $2,220 or $1,800.

Now, it is perfectly fair to consider that there must be a difference between some of the committees and others as to the work done, but there is another difference. When a Senator first comes to the Senate, naturally, in his first assignment he does not serve on such important committees as he does later, and hence does not have the amount of general committee work that he has to do later. As a general thing a Senator has less work to do for his constituents in the first term than he has in the second. Consequently, believing that all these salaries should be raised eventually, the committee has consented year after year to raise the pay of such of the clerks of committees as were presided over by Senators who were serving a second or third term.

The Senators who have those three committees mentioned by the Senator from Montana are Senators who two years and four years ago asked for this same increase and were denied, but after they had passed along to the time in the service when other Senators had been treated likewise these raises were made.

It is not a difference in the work of the committee so much as it is a concession to the Senator who is the head of the committee, and his accumulated work, by reason of longer service and more important committee assignments, aside from and in addition to his chairmanship of the one committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid aside temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Montana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DIXON. I wish to say in connection with what the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has just said, that I am well aware of the situation in the make-up of the committees of the Senate as to twelve or thirteen of the newer members of this body on the Republican side. When the committees were made up, on account of the condition of affairs existing in the Senate, while we saw the newer Democratic Senators receive committee assignments of double and treble proportionate relative value to those which we were assigned, we made no complaint in that matter. When we saw what was given some of the older Senators from States with business of no greater importance than some of the newer men in the body and went during the early part of the session to the head of the clerical department of the Senate, when we were lame, so far as clerical force was concerned, hoping that some crumbs of patronage which fell from the table of the white-buttoned mandarin in the Senate might fall our way, and found that there was absolutely nothing, we made no complaint of it. But when we see clerks working in our own offices with just as much work to do, and in many cases more than other clerks and receiving only 60 per cent of the pay, something is wrong.

Take a man from west of the Missouri River. The clerk of any Senator west of the Missouri River, with the ordinary family of a wife and two children, can not move his family from that point to Washington for less than $225 or $250. That comes twice a year. That makes an expense of easily $500, and sometimes $600, to the clerk who holds an $1,800 position. It leaves him $1,100 or $1,200 so far as his real pay goes.

The Senators who have these $1,800 clerks do not have four or five men detailed to their committees. I know of one Senator on the other side of the Chamber from where I stand whose clerk probably handles 300 letters a day and who is still in the $1,800 list. Comparisons, I know, are odious, but he is a man who does probably more work than almost any clerk in connection with the work here at the Capitol.

Now, while the committee say that the point of order can not be raised as to the committee amendments—and that possibly may be true—I can not conceive the equity of raising two or three special committees of the same grade, with the same work attached to the committees, and then leave all the rest unprovided for.

In this same bill the committee have reported an increase in salaries of men now drawing $2,500 and $3,000, clerks in the Senate, who are really session clerks, who are here only three or four months one year and only six or seven the other, while at the same time the men who really have done the heavy work in connection with the duties of Senators in this Chamber are left at the old salary of $1,800.

I do not believe, if Senators will think for a moment and understand the situation daily presented to many of us, to fifteen probably on our side of the Chamber, that it will lie in their hearts to raise the point of order against the amendment which I have just offered.

Mr. WARREN. It is not, as I said before, a pleasant thing to do, to raise a point of order, but it is, nevertheless, my duty as a member of the Appropriation Committee to do so. If the Senator has watched the course of events in the Senate in the past fifteen years he has seen that changes have all been in the direction the Senator indicates—of more committee clerks and higher salaries.

When I first came to the Senate I was provided with one clerk only, at $6 a day, for the session only. For the next period of some years I had one clerk only, at $1,200 a year; and that was the salary that the clerks of the minor committees then drew, although the clerks of the senior committees then drew a salary of $2,220 a year, as they now do. For some time the minority Senators had clerks at $1,200 a year. Later on these $1,200 clerks were raised to $1,500, and we went along for some years at $1,500, until a short time ago—I think it was six or eight years ago—we raised the salary of the clerks of the minor committees to $1,800 a year, and still later the clerks to minority Senators were raised to $1,800. I will say very frankly for myself, and I think the committee feels likewise, that in considering this—while, of course, it is our own matter as to our own clerks—the bill naturally has to be considered at both ends of the Capitol, and the differences have to be reconciled in conference, and we ought to consider the conditions as they exist. I believe every member of the committee is anxious to equalize and liberalize this matter of clerks' pay, but it is not in shape to be properly equalized at this time. I feel, therefore, constrained to make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator from Wyoming permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator from Wyoming know that this proposed increase will only make a difference of $5,300 per annum?

Mr. WARREN. It is not a matter of the amount of money that this increase makes, but there are other salaries that we pay other men that depend upon it, and it is the intention of the committee to give the whole subject comprehensive consideration and comprehensive treatment. I do hope the Senator may withdraw his amendment, because I dislike to insist upon the point of order.

I may say that the point of order, as I stated it, comes under Rule XVI. I did not state the full position. In addition to the fact of the necessity of furnishing an estimate, in addition to the requirement that a standing or select committee must report in favor of the amendment, there is an inhibition in the rule that—

> No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation—unless the other requirements are all fulfilled.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me for one or two questions?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator puts the objection to this amendment solely on the ground that these increases should be taken up en bloc and considered in the hereafter. Then, why is it that the committee throughout this bill, so far as the clerical force of the Senate is concerned, have raised the pay of different individual members here in at least a dozen cases? I find the clerk for one committee here is raised from $2,500 to $2,750, and another from $2,500 to $3,000. Another employee of the Senate is raised from $4,000 to $4,250 in this bill, while another employee on the clerical force is raised from $2,500 to $2,750. There is another instance here, where a clerk in the Senate has been raised from $2,500 to $3,000; another instance where a clerk has been raised from $1,440 to $1,800, and another from $2,220 to $2,500.

Mr. WARREN. It is not necessary that the Senator shall read all these various cases. They are not all Senators' clerks nor committee clerks.

Mr. DIXON. If it is impossible to readjust this matter as to eight or nine individual cases, who are the sole dependents of the Senators involved, why did not the committee wait until next year to readjust the salaries of twelve or fifteen others? I find new places created in two or three parts of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Montana that it is an easy matter to ask questions as to 100, 200, or 500 items in an appropriation bill. It takes the subcommittee weeks to consider the matter. They had all the papers and facts before them. They considered each case individually. The matter then comes before the full committee and it is given attention there. It is idle to undertake to take up scores of these individual cases, and ask me, or ask any other member of the Senate, to say why we did this thing or why we did the other thing in the short hour at our command in finishing the consideration of this bill. In every instance these matters were considered solely upon their merits—the amount of work the Senate employee was performing, something, of course, being accredited to length of service——

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. One moment, please. Something, of course, is credited to the length of service of the Senators themselves.

One more thought before I yield to interruption. The rolls of this Senate show that the number of employees for Senators has been very liberally increased in the last few years. There has been some $135,000 per annum added for additional employees, who have been distributed to junior Senators and to the minority Senators quite as generously as to the majority and to senior Senators.

Committees that had but one clerk, at $1,200, during my first term of service have now clerks at $1,800, assistant clerks at $1,440, messengers at $1,440—three employees where they then had but one. So I do not think the accusation that we are parsimonious as to this provision of help for Senators holds good.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WARREN. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I just wanted to note the statement of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the effect that the committee have taken into consideration in these raises the services rendered by the clerks to committees. I notice by this bill that the clerk to the Committee on Canadian Relations is raised. I am a member of that committee, and I know that it has never met in the three years in which I have been in the Senate. I happen to be chairman of the Committee on Coast and Insular Survey, which is likewise one of those committees which do not meet; but my secretary is compelled to travel from the Pacific coast to this city, clear across the continent, while the clerk to the committee I have just named would be naturally compelled to travel only 200 or 300 miles at the utmost. The clerks to many of these minor committees I am certain are performing from twelve to fourteen hours' service every day, and I am unable to see why all clerks similarly situated are not entitled to the same compensation paid to other clerks, who render no greater service.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I assume the Senator was not listening when I stated why these two or three raises were made.

Mr. PILES. I did not hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that all along it has been the custom where a Senator was here in his second or third term, even though his committee was not so important, to increase the salary of his clerk. That is the reason for those two increases.

Mr. DIXON. I would state to the Senator from Wyoming that the chairman of the Committee on Canadian Relations is at this time serving his first term in the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon; he is serving his second term.

Mr. DIXON. He has not served six years.

Mr. WARREN. Very well; but he is serving his second term.

Mr. PILES. I do not put this upon the ground of the length of service of a Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say further that I should be one of the first to insist that the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] should be equally treated when their turns come. Now, as a matter of fact, I believe that before a year from now we shall be paying every one of these committee clerks more money, as in my judgment we should do; but we should take this matter up in a logical way.

The railroad-rate law, passed last year, of course added to the expense of committee clerks. The rate law made it unlawful for clerks of Western Senators or others to secure free transportation on the railroads. It is true—whether it ought to have been so or not—that before the passage of the rate law Senators' clerks were often passed over the railroads, so that their expenses were very much lessened. I know that when the clerk of the Senator from Montana now comes to Washington from Montana and returns, unless he is more favored than I am, he has to pay full fare down and back. The same is true of all our clerks from all States. I think it would be perfectly consistent, even more so perhaps than raising salaries, for us to provide mileage for our clerks, so that those who are living far away might be equalized as to traveling expenses with those nearer. That is one of the matters that is to be considered, and is a matter which I shall insist, when this question is taken up in the next appropriation bill, shall have consideration.

Mr. PILES. Now, Mr. President, I wish to explain my position in this matter. It is not a question of the length of service of a Senator in this body. I am speaking here for a class of men who I feel are underpaid for the services which they render this Government.

I am glad the committee has seen fit to raise the salaries of the other clerks referred to in this bill. As a matter of fact, I understand that some twelve or fifteen clerks have had their salaries raised by the committee as the bill is now presented to the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. PILES. How many, then, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. WARREN. Four, or possibly five, including one assistant.

Mr. PILES. I am sorry that there are not more than four, and if this amendment of the Senator from Montana should fail I shall nevertheless support, so far as I am concerned, the raise in the four salaries mentioned in the bill.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, it is not a question of the length of service of a Senator in this body that entitles his secretary to reasonable compensation for the service which he renders. The young men who come from the Pacific coast are put to a large expense in journeying to and from the capital. They come from a section of the country where, if they are intelligent and energetic, they can command, as more than one of them have commanded, a salary greater than they are receiving to-day from this Government.

I maintain, sir, that no Government has the right to exact from its people a service and pay them inadequately for that service. This Government is altogether too great and too powerful to decline to pay men just and sufficient compensation for the service they render the Government. There is not a member of this body to-day but knows that a Senator's secretary, receiving only $1,800 a year, who is compelled to travel at his own expense across the continent, is receiving totally inadequate compensation for the service which he is rendering to the Government.

So I maintain that the amendment of the Senator from Montana, in equity and in good conscience, should prevail. For that reason I support it, and for that reason I shall support every amendment along the lines referred to by the Senator from Wyoming which is included in this bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I only wish to say that I think the Senate gains nothing in the estimate of the country by these scrambles and solicitations to increase the compensation of the Senate's clerical force. There are no men in the service of the Government that are so well paid as the employees about the Senate and the House of Representatives. They have long vacations and they have high salaries compared with the salaries that are paid in the Departments. This matter would not occupy the time of the Senate, Mr. President, and we should not be subjected, as we are every year, to these contests, but for the fact that these employees are near Senators, and their desires and their wishes for increased pay are made known through the Senators by whom they are employed.

Every old Senator knows that there is not a Senator in this body who has not got two and three times as much patronage in the clerks that he brings here and the messengers that he gets employed as it was possible to get a few years ago, and I should hope that some day the Senate will not, whenever a bill making an appropriation for salaries comes up, be treated to claims for extra pay and for more clerks.

I have been here a good many years, and I have got, Mr. President, in the entire force of the Senate, but one man from my State—the clerk of my committee. That does not trouble me at home. If I had a good friend in Maine who was getting a fair, comfortable salary, I would not let him come here to Washington. He is much better off to stay at home, to be an independent man, and to get his living there. It is not a favor to him to take him away from home under those circumstances. One of the Senators, in this debate, told us about a clerk who could get larger pay at home and be better off. I have no doubt he would be better off to stay at home, and we ought not to let the Senate be importuned by the clerks, who are already generously paid compared with other clerks, to increase their salaries.

I do not know anything about the merits of this particular controversy, but the Committee on Appropriations has to do the best it can, and I am willing to take their judgment about it.

I did not quite like the threat thrown out by the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] that, if he did not get what he wanted, he would object to anybody else getting anything. That is not quite the way to legislate in the Senate. Frequently we do not get here what we want; but if we wait, as the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has suggested, until there is a general making up of the clerical force and the assignment of rooms in the new building, I think the committee will do pretty fair justice. I hope the Senator will be content to wait, as everybody else has to do, and take his chance.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I only stated that if the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] saw fit to make a point of order against my amendment, I certainly felt I had a right to reserve the point of order against amendments in ten or twelve other cases. In that I think I am right. An examination discloses ten other clerks whose salaries are raised, with only these men left at the old salary.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I agree with the suggestion that every Senator ought to be put practically on the same level and that all should have the same number of employees, always, of course, taking into consideration the services that they have to render. I do not believe that a Senator who is chairman of a great committee, with a large amount of work, should be put upon the same level as to the number of employees under him as a Senator who has little or nothing to do in the way of committee work. Of course there has grown up in the Senate a rule that those things are determined somewhat by the seniority of Senators.

I think at the present time, Mr. President, there is very little ground for complaint. It seems to me the Senate has dealt pretty liberally with its employees. Certainly Senators who have come into this Senate within the last few years are very much better treated than some of us who came in thirty years ago. I was a member of the Senate without any assistant whatever longer than either the Senator from Montana or the Senator from Washington has been here. I had no assistants except the ones I employed and paid myself. I became chairman of one of the large committees—the Pension Committee—which does as much work as any committee here, and I employed during the entire time I was chairman of that committee a private secretary of my own and paid for his services out of my salary, because the Senate had not been accustomed at that time to furnish sufficient help to the committees to do the work.

I sympathize with every man who is employed here and who is not getting as much salary as he feels he ought to have. I recognize that the clerks who come from the Pacific coast and that section of the country are subjected to an expense that those coming from other sections of the country are not subjected to, and I believe it would be a fair thing if we should provide that at least their expenses back and forth with their Senators should be paid.

A Senator has the right to select, and he ought to select, if possible, his clerk from the section of country from which he comes. A clerk so selected will be more useful to him and more beneficial to the community than a stranger from another section of the country. It has been suggested to me, and I believe it is a wise suggestion, to allow traveling expenses at least to these clerks. I do not know whether we can afford to raise the salary of everybody in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I do not know what such a proposition would cost, and I believe raising the salaries of some clerks 20 per cent, while in very many cases it would be a fair thing to the clerks, would be an unfair thing to the Government. I think if we are going to do that, there ought to be some way of determining who are rendering the best service to the Government, who are rendering a $1,200 service or an $1,800 service, and who are rendering only a thousand-dollar service.

It was impossible, Mr. President, for the committee to go into that. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations and a member of the subcommittee that had this bill in charge, I say it was absolutely impossible to do that. Therefore we took in a few cases where we felt clerks were rendering service that was worthy of a higher rate, and we promoted them, in some instances in the Departments and in a few instances in the Senate.

I do not believe that we can rectify all the matters that ought to be rectified in this bill at this time. As the Senator from Wyoming suggested, I think, perhaps, at some time we may be able to provide efficient service and an efficient payment for the service rendered.

I understand that the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] thinks he can make a point of order against the increases the committee have made. If he does, and the point is sustained, it will be the first time in the history of the Senate that that has ever been done. It can be done in another body, I know, but it can not be done here without a violation of the precedents and rules that have been in vogue ever since I have been connected with the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I would hardly do justice either to the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] or to myself if I let stand without correction our differing statements as to the number of committee clerks who have their salaries raised in this bill. It might raise a question of veracity between us. I stated that there were four or five clerks to Senators who had received a raise in salary in the bill. The Senator from Montana said ten or twelve. I think I am correct. The Senator would have been correct if he had explained that only five of them are Senator's clerks. The others are clerks of the Senate, and belong to every Senator. The increase of the salary of a clerk in the financial room or here at the desk is an increase to an employee of the Senate, who is equally valuable to every one of the ninety-two Senators. But, as to committee clerks, there are, I think, but four clerks and one assistant clerk whose salaries are raised in this bill.

I want to say that one of the troubles in settling this question is the very matter which has been suggested and which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has so clearly discussed; and that is whether we shall arrange a different scale of pay, or, if not a different scale of pay, at least provide for the payment of the expenses of those employees who necessarily come a long distance. It is true that there is plenty of help here in Washington. We can all of us get clerks from here; but it is also true that a Senator wants somebody from his own home. He wants his clerk here when he is here attending to his public duties, and he is likely to want him at home at other times when he must also perform public service. Therefore, the clerks that come here with Senators must themselves pay, or their employers must pay, their traveling expenses here and back. I submit that a Senator who has to bring a clerk 3,000 miles or more is in a more difficult situation than the one within an hour's ride of the capital. I do not know how we may meet it, but it is one of the things, I think, which ought to be considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the Senator who brings his clerk 3,000 miles gets about 1,000 miles more mileage than those of us who live nearer Washington?

Mr. WARREN. That is absolutely true.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that there is inequality in that matter.

Mr. WARREN. There is.

Mr. GALLINGER. Which, perhaps, ought to be rectified.

Mr. WARREN. There is; but if the Senator——

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to say a word right there?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me just a moment, I will yield to him. I wish to say that that is a matter which it is entirely proper to consider. So far as I am concerned, I have been always willing to consider it—either to wipe it out, or to make it actual expenses, or to change it in any other way. That is one of the things that ought to be considered at the same time the question of increasing the salaries of the clerks is considered. I submit the more you debate this question, the deeper you go into it, the more ready you will be to sustain the committee that there has not been time heretofore to properly consider these questions. There will be time hereafter when this whole subject can be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, what I desired to suggest to the Senator was in reference to the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. The mileage is presumed to be sufficient to cover the expenses of a Senator and his family in moving to this city and back again once a year. If the average family numbers about five—and I presume that that is true—it would just about make up the mileage. I think every Senator will agree with me that that is practically true. So it does not make any difference whether he comes 3,000 miles or whether he comes 300 miles.

Mr. GALLINGER. Suppose he has no family?

Mr. WARREN. Then he ought to get one. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCUMBER. I am speaking of the average family. So when you average this up, the amount is about the same.

I did not intend to take part in the discussion of this matter, and only rose to suggest that it seems to me, Mr. President, that we have left out another item, and that is that the principal secretary to every Senator must not only be present here with him, but, especially under the new system, which makes it absolutely necessary for a Senator to go over every section of his State in order to understand its wants, his secretary must also travel all over the State. Therefore, the secretary is never at home. He is at continuous expense. I am speaking only of the one that must accompany the Senator over the State. In a large State the expenses are very large, and every Senator knows that in the Southern States, as well as in the Western States, where we have not so many very large cities, but where we must be acquainted with the entire community, it is necessary for a Senator to get over the State, and it is necessary for him generally to have his secretary with him.

I see no reason why, when Senators were considering why some of these should be raised, they could not equalize all the principal secretaries, place them all on about the same basis, because their expenses will be very similar, and without saying one word as to whether it is sufficient now or whether it ought to be raised, as the point of order has been made against the amendment and it is not proper to discuss the merits of the subject, it does seem to me that it is nothing more than fair to ask that the committee consider the equalization of the salaries of all the principal secretaries and placing them upon an equal basis.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course it is easier to criticise from the outside a committee for its action than it is in working on the inside to assemble the wisdom of the entire committee and bring out a given point or result unanimously adhered to. It is therefore sometimes better to make haste slowly; it is sometimes better to take more time; and I want to say very frankly here and now, and I want to say it for the benefit of the clerks of the committees, I believe they will make time and money by good-naturedly allowing this matter to go over until the committee has more time and expecting it to treat them liberally, as I believe it will.

Now, as I said before, and the Senator from Colorado alludes to it, I am not yet one of the old Senators here, and yet I had only one clerk at $1,200 for a long, long time, and then one at $1,500, and then $1,800; and I want to say further, notwithstanding some things that have been said through newspapers and otherwise, that there never has been a year since I have been in the Senate that I have not paid from my own pocket money additional to that which the United States paid for employees for my committee and for myself in conducting the public business.

As I said before, we have in a very few years added to the Senate expenses for clerks, messengers, stenographers, laborers, etc., for Senators, from one hundred and thirty-five to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars—I have not the exact figures at hand. Situated as I was for several years upon the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I naturally noticed the additions as they came along. I think the Senate has been exceedingly liberal in providing employees to all the Senators, and nearly all that amount of money has been for help to those who had junior committees, so called, or who were junior Senators.

We have loaded up our contingent fund (it is a matter I do not care to talk much about) in such a way, as you all know, that it is top-heavy. We should go into that matter and arrange the rolls properly. With the attention the committee has given the subject already, with the discussion which has taken place here to-day and the opinions expressed, with the coming of the summer vacation I believe there will be a scheme of rearrangement of salaries adopted by the committee which will satisfy every Senator.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I rise simply to make an inquiry of the Senator who has charge of the bill at this time, who, I understand, is the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. CULBERSON. At the top of page 7 there is an amendment proposed by the committee to strike out "two assistant messengers on the floor of the Senate, at $1,440 each" and to insert "two messengers on the floor of the Senate, at $2,000 each."

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what has become of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Texas that unless he desires to be heard in regard to the amendment now pending——

Mr. CULBERSON. Of course I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Georgia, but I understand his amendment is not pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a point of order pending raised upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana, and unless the Senator from Texas desires to address himself to that the Chair will rule upon the point of order.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not care to address myself to that particular amendment, but I want to ask the Senator from Wyoming, who has charge of the bill at this particular time, I understand, why it is that at the top of page 7 the salary of the messengers at one door of the Senate have been increased from $1,440 to $2,000, while the compensation of the messengers at the other door of the Senate remains where it is.

Mr. WARREN. I do not quite understand the inquiry of the Senator. What is his inquiry, please?

Mr. CULBERSON. At the top of page 7 of the bill the committee propose to strike out two messengers on the floor of the Senate at $1,440 and to increase their compensation to $2,000 each. Now, my information is, and I speak only from information, not from actual knowledge, that the messengers referred to are at one door of the Senate, whereas the compensation of the messengers at another door of the Senate, longer in service, is to remain at $1,440. I should like to understand it. Of course, I dare say, there is some reasonable explanation, and I should be glad to have it if there is.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, we have not raised the salaries of the messengers at the door. We have raised the salaries of two men who have grown up from early boyhood here in the Senate, who are upon the floor, and are not stationed at either one of the doors. They are two men who are as necessary almost to the Senators as are their own eyes or their hands in the duties they perform, in hours and out of hours, in season and out of season. I allude to Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Sumner, one upon each side of the Senate, who have grown up here from boys in knickerbockers to splendid, mature, and useful manhood.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does the Senator suggest that that is the object of the amendment at the top of page 7?

Mr. WARREN. It is, to raise the pay of the two men I have stated, because, in the opinion of the committee, they are earning more money than they are receiving. In fact, they ought to have been raised long before, and they are raised this year in consideration of what they have done and what they are doing and what we expect them to do.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator, of course, will understand that I am simply seeking information from the Senator in charge of the bill as to the facts in the case. My information was entirely different from what the Senator states.

Mr. WARREN. I assumed that the Senator must be mistaken. As the Senator has mentioned the messengers on the doors, I will state that he will find in lines 24 and 25 on page 6 that forty-six messengers are provided for at $1,440 each. These are the messengers on all the doors.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise to ask a question of the Senator from Wyoming. As I understand the statement of the Senator, there is no controversy but that the increased salaries would be just and proper. It is only a question of regulating other salaries in conformity thereto, as I understand.

Mr. WARREN. We admit that the men mentioned and the positions mentioned should receive before long a higher salary, but in order to keep up the relation of committees one with another and the help for one Senator with another it has been deemed inexpedient at this time to enter into that field when the time is so near at hand when we must readjust the entire matter.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to make a remark. If it is just, why inexpedient? It would simply——

Mr. WARREN. It is inexpedient sometimes to do slight justice at the expense of injustice to several others, and the only trouble, as I said before, is that we have not before us the estimates, we have not the time, we are not satisfied as to what additional help will soon be needed here at the new building, and there are a number of matters entering into this question which are obvious to me, and probably to the Senator, making this an inexpedient time to consider it.

Mr. WARNER. During my short term in the Senate, Mr. President, I have entered into no scramble for patronage at the hands of the Senate, nor have I importuned anyone in relation thereto. But I do believe that the twelve clerks named in the amendment are entitled to the increase of salary, which in the aggregate will amount to $5,000, and my only purpose in rising in my place is to ask the Senator from Wyoming, knowing his good nature and his disposition always to act justly, to let the point of order be withdrawn and take the sense of the Senate upon the amendment. That was my only purpose in rising. It is not necessary to discuss the merits of the question if the point of order is to be pressed.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that it hurts me worse than it does the Senator from Missouri, or the feelings of any other Senator, to insist upon the point of order, but the Senator probably knows, as I do, what is to follow and what I shall have to do or some other Senator on the committee will have to do in order in some way to protect at this time the bill that is before the body, and the Treasury of the United States, and the comity and equity which ought to exist between the different Departments, and the proper schedules that ought to be preserved. It is well known that another amendment raising the salaries of many thousand employees and adding many millions of dollars is about to be offered to this bill; so I can not in justice withdraw the point of order, but I must insist upon it.

Mr. WARNER. I make this suggestion to the Senator: If, as intimated, and no doubt as is true, it hurts him to make the point of order as much as it hurts me, let us remove the cause of the injury by withdrawing the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. I must insist upon the point of order.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I have not been able to talk very much this afternoon, because I am not in good health to-day, but I desire to say a word.

The subcommittee and finally the full committee did the very best it could with reference to this subject. The question of the adjustment of salaries, even in connection with the Senate itself has been a source of embarrassment to all of the committee for many years. The Senate knows that I have had charge of the legislative bill for several years. They also know that I have tried to be as liberal to the different parties and the different classes of committee clerks as possible.

I remember, as has been stated, that I, as chairman of the subcommittee, had charge of the bill which gave the minority members of the Senate a clerk each at $1,500. There was complaint that that was not enough for the men who had to come a great distance and who worked just as hard as those who were clerks of committees, and so we raised it to $1,800, which sum that class of clerks gets now.

I have felt all the time that there ought to be a committee, not to prepare an appropriation bill, but to take up his subject of committee clerks and clerks to Senators, and adjust their salaries, and for that matter adjust the salaries of all employees in connection with the Capitol, and then let Congress fix their salaries by law in some way, so that when we come to consider the appropriation bill we would not have this embarrassment on our hands every time. That has been the condition and it will continue to be the condition unless there is a general overhauling of the subject and legislation in reference to it.

I think myself that some committee ought during the coming summer, after the session is over, to take up the question and see whether the salaries can not be adjusted, so that not only the clerks themselves will be fairly satisfied, but that the Senators who have the employment of the clerks will be. Then when the Appropriation Committee take up the appropriation bill we can go ahead and make the appropriations and feel that we are not going to be charged with dealing unfairly with one and more than fairly with another.

I certainly have no interest in being unjust to anybody. When I came here twenty-five years ago I had one clerk, whom I brought with me, and he was my clerk and only clerk for a number of years. I never had any other help for ten or twelve years at least, and we got along very well by working a good share of the night, as well as all day, as some of us do now.

But at the same time this inequality exists. The committee itself realizes it, and all that I hope is that every Senator here who feels that he ought to have more help and better-paid help will wait until we get an opportunity to adjust the matter in some way, if it is possible to do so, so as to satisfy every Senator.

I hope, Mr. President, that this debate will not run on very much longer, but that we will come to some conclusion about the amendment, and pass the bill and adjourn.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] indicated that it is an ungrateful task to interpose a point of order to the consideration of an amendment of this kind, and later on, in response to the appeal of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], he indicated that he would have to adhere to that determination in order to protect this bill from a flood of amendments. I assume that this statement refers to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] which he intimated——

Mr. BACON. I wish to say to the Senator that I have been trying all day to offer my amendment, and have not had the opportunity to get it before the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suppose the Senator from Wyoming referred to the amendment which it is well known the Senator from Georgia will present when he has the opportunity.

Mr. BACON. I would suggest to the Senator that if he will permit the Chair to rule on the point of order, I will then offer the amendment, and it will be before the Senate for discussion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say something regarding the point of order.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon. I did not know that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. One reason why I shall vote against the point of order, if it is ever submitted to a vote of the Senate, is that I wish to see relief given to the clerks in the Departments. I think that has been too long delayed, and that, in view of the fact that we have increased our own salaries and the salaries of the higher officials. It is exceedingly ungracious to delay that act of justice. However inadequate the amendment may be increasing the pay of the clerks as offered here, it will be easy enough to correct it in conference, for the committees have had under consideration bills relating to the increased compensation of the civil employees of the Government, and it will be easy in conference to prepare, after due deliberation, the measure that will finally go upon the statute book. I shall vote for the measure, even though I do not regard it as meeting all the requirements of the case, with a view to making it the basis for just and proper action in conference.

Now, as to the raise of the compensation of the clerks of Senators, I will state, and it is the fact, that there are different grades of salaries, and the suggestion is made that as to new Senators the same compensation should not be expected for their clerks as for the clerks of older Senators. As I have been here about five years, I may perhaps be regarded on the verge of the senior class and as no longer belonging to the freshman class in this august body. Therefore it may not be unbecoming in me to suggest that there should be no inequality in the salaries of the clerks of Senators. Senators certainly stand equal under the law and under the Constitution, and if there is a Senator who requires the aid of experience and ability in his secretary or clerk, it is the new Senator rather than the old, for the new Senator is unaccustomed to the duties of his position and the older Senator has the advantage of training and of experience.

I believe adequate salaries should be paid. I believe the salary should be the same to all, whether they are clerks to older Senators or to newer Senators; and I believe this is the time to determine the question, for we are engaged now in the consideration of a bill that relates to this very question, and we all realize that Congress is so busy that it is exceedingly improbable that the just claims of the clerks in the civil departments of the Government will be recognized at this session unless recognition is forced in some such way as this. I am sure that the majority in this body realize the justice of the claims of civil employees for increased compensation, and if that is so, this is the only opportunity we will have of meeting their just demands.

It has been the custom of the Senate upon an appeal from the decision of the Chair on a point of order to determine what the Senate wills, regardless of the rules; to interpose the highest law of the present judgment of the Senate as against the recorded rule, and I propose so to act in this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is unable, of course, to give consideration to the equities which are involved in the proposed amendment. The only question for him to determine is, Is it in contravention of the rules of the Senate? It is provided, among other things, in paragraph 1, Rule XVI:

> No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill * * * unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

The proposed amendment, in the opinion of the Chair, is plainly in conflict with that provision of the rule, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, and I ask that it be read from the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in the bill the following:

> That the salaries or compensation, not exceeding $1,800 per annum, now allowed by law to clerks and employees of the classified service in the Executive Departments employed in the city of Washington, including the employees in the Congressional Library and the Government Printing Office, are hereby increased to the amount of 20 per cent thereon: Provided, That this increase of salary or compensation shall not be allowed to any class of clerks or employees the compensation or salary of which said class has been increased under any provision of law enacted subsequent to the 1st day of December, 1903.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am well aware——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the first part of the amendment be again read. There was some disturbance, and I did not hear it.

Mr. BACON. I shall be glad to have the whole of it read again.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just the first few lines will do.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Clerk again read the amendment. My attention was diverted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. I suppose the Senator from Georgia desires to discuss the amendment. I shall make the point of order, but I withhold it for the present.

Mr. BACON. I have the floor. The Senator from Wyoming can not make the point of order until I am through, I suppose.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I have no desire to take the Senator from Georgia off the floor.

Mr. BACON. I have no indisposition to yield the floor to the Senator for any other purpose, but I do not propose to yield to him that he may take me off the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I plainly stated that I would not do that. I hope the Senator will not build his argument upon that assumption, which is entirely erroneous.

Mr. BACON. I wanted, if possible, to find the Senator from Wyoming in an open state of mind. I was about to remark that I am well aware of the fact that under the recent ruling of the Chair, and which I think was eminently correct, the amendment is open to the point of order, and must go out if the point of order is made and insisted upon. I wish, however, just in a few words to suggest some reasons which, I hope, may influence the committee or those who represent it upon the floor of the Senate to-day not to make the point of order.

Mr. President, the class of employees of the Government to whom the amendment would apply are in somewhat different position from those whose claims have been discussed here this evening. I do not desire to repeat what I said upon a former occasion. A few days ago, when this amendment was suggested by me, I gave the reasons which I thought ought to influence the Senate in favoring it, and I shall not detain the Senate with a repetition of what I then said further than simply to repeat the general proposition that this is about the only class of employees of the Government who have not been included in the increases of salary which have been made in the past few years, and they are the ones who, it seems to me, above all others ought to commend themselves to the favorable consideration of the Senate in this regard.

The Senator from Maine spoke of the fact that the employees of the Senate, for the raising of whose salaries the amendment was offered, which was ruled upon by the Chair, were a well-paid class, and spoke of the additional fact that they were on duty only a part of the year, and the still further fact that they were near to the Senators where they could present their claims. Now, in no particular are the clerks of the classes who are included in this amendment subject to those particular peculiarities. None of the features apply to them. They are here the whole year.

I wish to say in justice to them, Mr. President, that whatever may have been the experience of other Senators, no single one of them has ever suggested to me that a movement of this kind should be made in their favor. In fact, I had no thought of it until on Tuesday—I think it was—when the bill was before the Senate; in looking over it and seeing that provisions had been made for the increase of salaries of different officials of the Government there occurred to me what I had previously thought of, that there was a class which had not received any favors of this kind or had not had consideration so far as I knew.

I therefore ventured to ask the committee whether they had had under consideration the propriety of the raising of the salaries of the clerks in the lower grades, and out of that inquiry has all this matter grown. The more I have thought of it the more I have been impressed with the fact that justice required that there should be a consideration of their claims and that there should be an increase of their salaries.

No Senator has taken issue with the suggestion made by me in that regard. All of them have recognized the fact that the same conditions which made it proper that we should increase our own salaries, which made it proper that we should increase the salaries of the judiciary, which made it proper that we should increase the salaries of the officers and men in the Army, and that we should increase the salaries of the officers and men of the Navy applied and made it proper that there should be an increase in the salaries of these clerks in the city of Washington.

Now, all have agreed to that. I have had no suggestion to the contrary from any Senator. But the reply is, "This is not the time." Well, Mr. President, it is a serious matter to postpone it. If these parties are entitled to relief, postponement now means postponement for a year, and a year's increase of expenses without a year's increase of salary is a serious matter to these people.

I hold in my hand a letter which I am sorry I can not read in full to the Senate, because it is marked "personal." I will only say that it is written to me by a very high official whom I know personally, one of the highest in the Executive Departments, and it relates to the question, not simply as to the propriety as a matter of justice of raising the salaries of these clerks, but as to the interests of the Government in this regard. I can only read a part of it in such a way as not to disclose who the officer is or the Department to which he belongs. I vouch for what I said, however, with reference to the position he occupies and as to the influential character of the man. There is a part of the letter which it is not necessary that I should read, and I only read that part of it which relates to the particular feature which I suggested. He says:

> It is a very serious problem with this Department, doing business of a very large character, as to whether it can not only retain some of the higher grades of officials, but whether it can get the service that it ought to have out of its employees, who find it most difficult to make both ends meet, owing to the increased cost of living.

Mr. President, I say that comes from a high official, a man who can have no personal interest in the adoption of this amendment or in the increase of these salaries, but he is speaking of what he knows of the conditions among those who are under him in his official capacity.

It was suggested on Tuesday, when the matter was up for discussion in the Senate, that there had been within the past few years a good many increases in salaries which would affect the various classes of clerks, and that an indiscriminate increase of 20 per cent would give to some whose salaries have already been raised an advantage which they ought not to have, and an advantage which would be an invidious distinction between themselves and others of the classes of clerks who have not had this increase of salary.

Therefore it is that I put the proviso upon the amendment which I offered, that it should not relate to any class of clerks or employees whose salaries had been raised under any act of Congress enacted within the past four years, or rather within the past two Congresses, which is more than the past four years. So that feature of it is eliminated.

Now, Mr. President, why should we wait a whole year? It has been a year since we attended to our own necessities, and it has been more than a year since we added to the salaries of the judges, all of which I think was proper. At this session I suppose there is no question of the fact that most material increases are going to be made in the salaries of officers and men of the Army and officers and men of the Navy.

Mr. WARREN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that that is as yet all in the air. It is yet a question whether we will raise them or not. We hope to do so.

Mr. BACON. Well, if we act on this matter, it will be in the same sense, in the air. The Senator means by that, I suppose, that action is required by another body before it can become a law, to say nothing of the requirement of the approval of the President. But if we act upon this, the same is true as to it.

Mr. President, if we were straitened for money, it would be another thing. But we are not. Everyone knows that the Treasury is overflowing. Everyone knows that we have $250,000,000, approximately, of surplus deposited with the national banks. So it is a question as to what is just and right, as to what is justice in this matter. Should we recognize the changed conditions which made it proper that we should add 50 per cent to our own salaries, that we should add largely to the salaries of the judiciary, that so far as our action is concerned we have added largely to the military branch of the service, and that we undoubtedly intend to add largely to the salaries and compensation of the naval branch of the service? Is it right and proper that, with an overflowing Treasury, those in the public service who are the neediest and who have less opportunity to be heard should be passed over simply upon a mere matter of convenience?

Mr. President, this is not a matter without precedent. Once before the Government was confronted with a similar condition of affairs, and once before it took exactly the same action which I now ask shall be taken under this amendment. In 1867 the salaries of all the clerks and employees in the Executive Departments in the city of Washington were increased by 20 per cent by a joint resolution. It is true that that increase related only to one year, and I was going to ask the Senator from Wyoming and his associates in charge of this bill, whether if they will not agree to it as a general proposition they will not without limitation agree to an increase of 20 per cent in view of what we have done for ourselves, in view of what we have done for all other Departments of the Government, and in view of the fact that the only suggestion made is that this is not the time, that you can not go through all the schedules and make proper arrangements. Will not the Senator agree to this amendment if I limit it to one year? That will give the opportunity to readjust it in the next appropriation bill for the succeeding years.

But it does seem to me, Mr. President, that it is a hardship beyond expression as to this one class, this one needy class, this one class that has nobody to speak for them except such as may volunteer, and who are not allowed even under pain of dismissal probably or some other hardship, to advocate their own cause or to endeavor to get any political influence in their favor. Is it not proper that we should do that much for them? Then, if we find that the adjustment is not a proper one it will last only for a year, and in the next appropriation bill it can be so readjusted that inequalities may be corrected. It will not apply to any salary that is over $1,800, and it will do justice to a class which is as meritorious and which is more needy than classes which have already had this favor.

I hope the Senators will agree that the amendment which I have offered may be accepted provided I will limit to one year, giving the Appropriations Committee the full opportunity to do what they say they are now investigating and intend to do, and not keep these people for one whole year without this little meed of justice.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire proposes an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "city of Washington" in the amendment insert the words "or elsewhere."

After the words "Congressional Library" insert the words "the public library, the District government, all employees in the two branches of Congress receiving salaries of less than eighteen hundred dollars per annum."

Mr. BACON. When I saw my genial and kind-hearted friend the Senator from New Hampshire rise in his place, I did not have any doubt about the fact in my own mind but that he was going to offer an amendment which would be promotive of the cause which I am advocating, but what he offers is evidently intended to break down and defeat it.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, the first amendment certainly the Senator can not object to. There is no reason why the clerks in the great cities of New York, Boston, and Chicago should not have their salaries increased as well as the clerks in the city of Washington.

Mr. WARREN. No; nor out on the plains and in the mountains, where it costs a great deal more to live than it does in any one of the cities.

Mr. GALLINGER. And there is certainly no reason why clerks in the Congressional Library, where the salaries are fixed by the Librarian himself, should have their salaries increased and not the clerks in the public library. There is no reason why the clerks in the Executive Departments should have their salaries increased and not in the District government. I think when the Senator reflects he will see that I had no ulterior purpose in offering this amendment. I thing it ought to be broadened still more, but I had not time to think of all the different places that ought to come in for raises in salary if we are going into this business.

Mr. BACON. Of course, there may be reasons in particular cities which we are not in a condition to know of as we know of these. There is a good reason, however, why it should not be as broad as the Senator from New Hampshire has suggested. The vast army of employees all over the United States are not all of them, or even the greater part of them, situated as they are in Washington, where it is expensive to live. The very large majority of the employees of the Government scattered throughout the United States do not live in an expensive manner and are not in a position where it is necessary for them to live in an expensive manner.

So far as the District government is concerned, so far as they are the employees directly of the Government of the United States, the suggestion of the Senator may be a very pertinent and proper one, but I am not prepared to say that. Anyone will recognize, of course, that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire could not have had any other purpose except to defeat the measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The clerks in the Bureau of Pensions in Washington are receiving, I think, salaries that average at least $1,200. The clerks in the pension office in my own city are receiving salaries averaging $720 a year. It costs nearly as much to live in Concord, N. H., as it does in Washington, as I know from experience.

Now, is it not simple justice to give a relative increase to those clerks who are receiving $60 a month as well as to give it to those who are receiving $100 a month?

Mr. BACON. I may be very much mistaken in my idea, but I suppose board in Washington City of a proper kind, such kind as a person of that class would require, costs twice as much as in Concord.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no doubt it does to Senators, because we have to go to hotels, and the hotels always take note of our increases in salaries.

Mr. BACON. I know that at places not very distant from Concord they charge pretty high board.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think, so far as the ordinary necessaries of life are concerned, there is very little difference.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate. I had hoped, however, that my last appeal might find favorable response from the Senator and that this increase might be granted for one year.

I will merely add, in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, that in limiting it to Washington City I am simply following a precedent which I have already alluded to, where a similar measure was adopted by the Congress of the United States limiting the increase to the clerks in the city of Washington. There are a great many things that we should like to do all over the world in the way of benevolence and even in justice, but still we have to limit our efforts quite frequently to a very much more circumscribed area.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I love the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] for his liberality, but I am confident that if the Senator from Georgia were in my place or that of any other member of the Appropriation Committee, he would do exactly as we are doing. Whether I would do as he is now doing, if I were in his place, I do not know, but I presume I would. As I said before, there is a time and place for all these things.

This matter has been in the minds of Congress, not only for the last year, but for the last two years, and it has been in the mind of the Executive. It is well known that there has been a commission, the Keep Commission, so called, to look about regarding salaries and to arrange some schedule or suggest some plan for improvement and advancement.

Now, there is another place in this Capitol where these supply bills originate. This matter of increased salary was taken up there and very serious consideration given to it in a subcommittee and later in a full committee. The new plan and schedule were looked over. They were not fully agreed to, but I believe the committee put in a section as to one Department—the Department of the Interior—and submitted it to the House. The House finally concluded, as is shown by the RECORD, that it could not, for obvious reasons, at this time enter into the general raise that I think most of the Members believe must be made some time. When the committee reported the bill to the House there were substantially no raises, or few, if any, except as to the assistant secretaries. When the bill was considered on the House floor the plan that the committee had offered as a sample, in the case of the Interior Department, was annihilated. The raises that they had proposed for the salaries of assistant secretaries were put out on points of order, and the bill comes to us with the injunction that no raises will be permitted.

Now, the subcommittee of the Senate believed that there should be some increase, and so in arranging these salaries that have been spoken of as raising the high men they simply did this: For instance, we put into a Department, we will say, ten additional No. 4 clerks, drawing $1,800 each. These new places are to be filled with the most deserving clerks, and seniority is also to be considered, from class 3. So there you promote ten clerks $200 each. Their places in class 3 are filled by ten clerks from class 2, and there you promote another ten $200 each. Their places are filled by ten clerks from class 1, and there again are ten clerks increased $200 each. Their places are filled with ten clerks from $1,000, an increase of $200 each; their places are filled with ten from $900, an increase of $100 each; their places are filled with ten from $840, an increase of $60 each; their places are filled with ten from $720, an increase of $120 each, and in some cases with the next ten from $660 salary, an increase of $60 each.

So where we have added what seems to be an addition of only ten clerks, we nevertheless provide for the promotion and increase of pay for over 100 clerks, and there are many of such additions in the bill. In this way promotion and increase of pay come to those most competent and who have been longest in the Department, such as the Senator himself would select. Therefore if we are able to maintain or retain these amendments in conference we shall practically raise the salaries of a very large number. In the places will come in at the bottom new and untried men and women—those who do not perhaps have to enter the United States service unless they think that it is desirable and that the salary is more than they can get anywhere else. They come in at the bottom and they in turn are raised in time.

Now, the Senator proposes in his amendment to raise 20 per cent those who have not already been raised and debar those who have been heretofore raised from the benefits.

Mr. President, the injustice of that proposition is manifest. The clerks who have been raised from $720 to $840, the clerks raised from $900 to $1,000, and all along there, are subjected to an injustice because you have raised the one class more than you have raised the other. Those heretofore were raised less than 20 per cent and you debar them from any further benefits, while with the new ones not raised heretofore you give the larger benefits of a full 20 per cent.

In making the point of order, as I shall do, I do it with the same reluctance that I made it before, but it is utterly futile, in my judgment, to accept the amendment either for all time or for a year, with the circumstances as they are, and with the bill in the situation it is, and what the conferees will be confronted with.

Mr. President, this matter is receiving very serious consideration by every member of the Appropriations Committee, as I know, and if there may be a little patience it will be treated as other matters have been. Take the matter, if you please, of the salaries of Senators. How long had that been talked about and how long did we wait for it? If we have done wrong in that, I am perfectly ready to see them reduced again, but we waited until the Senators themselves were ready to take it up. We waited until the Members of the House would stand up and answer the roll as they did in the Senate. We waited until the press of the country supported it. We waited until the country itself said that we ought to have it.

Now, we raised the Army. We started a year ago. An amendment was offered on the floor similar to the one the Senator from Georgia offers. Some Senator offered a 20 per cent raise for the Army. The Senator from Maine very properly raised the point of order, as he should have done and as possibly the chairman in charge of the bill ought to have done, and of course the point of order was sustained.

The sentiment then existing has grown stronger, and to-day we have before us the action of the Senate, which has said we will increase the pay of the Army and the Navy. We have had from the House a declaration that we will pay a small increase to part of the Army. What may finally become of the measure we do not know.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether his committee has under consideration now any bill for the increase of the pay of the civil employees of the Departments here?

Mr. WARREN. The chairman of the subcommittee a moment ago said he was considering, and he thought we ought to consider, some special committee or some commission to take all these matters of salaries under consideration.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to ask him another question. He is doubtless aware that the Keep Commission looked into this question and presented a report for regrading and reclassifying the civil employees of the Departments, fixing the salaries of the different grades. He is doubtless aware that that bill was considered by the Committee on Appropriations in the House last year.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And the result, so I am informed——

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me state to the Senator what my information is. My information is that that bill was considered by the Committee on Appropriations. At that time the committee was not altogether satisfied with it, and they authorized Mr. Littauer, a member of the committee, to present an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill which covered the whole question of classification, grades, and salaries. That amendment was presented by Mr. Littauer and the point of order was raised against it, not by the committee itself, but by some Member upon the floor of the House, and the point of order was sustained.

Now, I ask the Senator whether it would not be the best way of getting at this thing for the Senate to permit the Littauer amendment, or the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia, to go upon this bill, and then in conference it will furnish the basis for an adjustment of the entire matter between the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and the committee of the House? It seems to me that that would result in an orderly disposition of the matter and give full consideration.

I mentioned that disposition of it to a member of the Committee on Appropriations of the other House this morning, and he thought it would be entirely satisfactory. I am told that over there now they have a subcommittee of that committee that is engaged in the consideration of this question; but the danger is that, in the pressure of public business, if they succeed in reporting a bill to the House, even within the next two or three weeks, it will not be considered before final adjournment.

Mr. WARREN. What was the question the Senator from Nevada was going to ask me?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Therefore I ask the Senator whether this method of proceeding will not result, not in an ill-considered provision for these employees, but in a well-considered provision, and whether these points of order and technical objections should be interposed in a matter involving every consideration of humanity and right and justice?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to insert in my remarks upon this subject of the salaries of civil-service employees the Littauer amendment, which was offered in the other House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. Littauer to the bill (H. R. 25851) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for prior years, and for other purposes, viz: Insert the following:

Salaries of employees engaged in professional, technical, or scientific work shall conform as far as possible to the classes and grades of the above schedules.

That as soon as practicable after the passage of this act a committee of not exceeding nine persons shall be appointed by the President, whose duty it shall be to consider the character of work performed by the clerks in the several bureaus and offices in the Executive Departments and other Government establishments in the city of Washington and the salaries now paid therefor. Said committee shall recommend to the President for each Department a readjustment and classification of the force of said Department in accordance with the foregoing schedules, so as to bring about a general uniformity of compensation in all offices for the same kind and amount of work; and for the fiscal year 1909, and annually thereafter, each Department shall prepare and submit its estimates for clerical and other services in the Departments in accordance with the classification herein provided for and shall apportion the clerks of the different classes according to the work they are actually performing.

In no event shall any person whose principal duties are within a given class be paid more than the maximum salary for said class, and the number of employees specifically appropriated for in any branch of the service in any of the Executive Departments or other Government establishments in Washington shall not be increased, but may be diminished.

Hereafter all promotions shall be based on efficiency, and it is specifically declared to be the duty of chiefs of divisions to make recommendations for demotion where the interests of the public service require it, and any chief of division who fails to comply with this requirement shall be summarily dismissed from the public service.

Promotion in each class and subdivision thereof shall be made in each Executive Department or other Government establishment in Washington by a board composed of three officials of said Department appointed by the Secretary thereof.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course I do not have the private history of matters and things happening in the other House. I simply take the public record, which we have a right to review, and, judging from that, the matter is not ripe, and it is not in season or condition now to be taken up.

As to putting an omnibus amendment on the bill and undertaking to work it out in conference, if the Senator from Nevada had been upon one of those conferences he could easily understand how difficult, in fact, how impossible, that is. The conferees are then compelled to work between certain lines—that is, the upper and lower line contained in the amendment itself. So they could get only a partial consideration.

So, Mr. President, I feel that it is for the best interest of the parties themselves to allow the matter to go over, and I therefore make the point of order against the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The rules governing the moving of amendments to general appropriation bills are clear. The provision which the Chair read from Rule XVI in support of his ruling upon a similar point of order earlier in the day is as follows:

> No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill * * * unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

The amendment proposed and challenged by the point of order is not moved by direction of either a standing or a select committee of the Senate. It is clearly in violation of the rule quoted, and therefore the point of order is sustained.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am authorized by the Judiciary Committee to offer the amendment which I send to the desk. I ask that it be made an independent section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment from the Judiciary Committee as a separate section, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

> That hereafter the judges of the district court of the United States shall be allowed the sum of $6 per day as expenses of travel and attendance for each day that any such judge shall be necessarily absent from his place of residence in holding court or in the discharge of other judicial duties in any other place in the district whereof he is judge. That for the purposes of this act any such judge shall be deemed to reside in that place in his district in which his time is principally employed in holding court and otherwise discharging his official duties. Said sum to be paid upon the written certificate of such judges, and such payment shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of the accounts of the United States.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Just a word in explanation of the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If the point of order is to be raised against the amendment, I shall not take a moment of time in explaining it.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I wish to make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Then it is useless to take the time of the Senate in discussing the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CULBERSON obtained the floor.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think I yielded prematurely on the matter of the amendment which I just offered. I ought to have carried my statement a little further. It is an amendment suggested by a standing committee of the Senate, and I doubt if it is subject to the point of order raised by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. It would certainly be the enactment of new legislation.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That may be true, but any amendment is new legislation. If it were not new legislation it would not be an amendment; but does it propose the kind of new legislation that is prohibited by the rules of the Senate?

Mr. CULLOM. I have no question but that it is in conflict with the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I believe I shall ask for the judgment of the Chair on that proposition.

Mr. CULLOM. All right. I call attention, Mr. President, to paragraph 3 of Rule XVI, which provides that—

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto.

It seems to me the amendment is clearly outside of the rule.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I probably did not state to the Senator from Illinois that this amendment was heretofore offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and was intended to be proposed to the bill providing for the sundry civil expenses of the Government. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and what I now offer is the provision which was agreed upon by that committee, which directed me to present it to the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. It is entirely new legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois understand that this proposed amendment in any way changes existing law?

Mr. CULLOM. I think it clearly does so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 154, line 4, after the word "Congress," it is proposed to insert "including information showing the wholesale and retail prices at which American-made goods are sold abroad."

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, at this late hour I do not intend to consume the time of the Senate in a discussion of this amendment. It is intended to come in after the word "Congress," at the end of line 4, on page 154, in the paragraph which reads as follows:

> For compensation at not more than $10 per day and actual necessary traveling expenses of special agents to investigate trade conditions abroad, with the object of promoting the foreign commerce of the United States, $40,000; and the results of such investigations shall be reported to Congress.

For at least five years, Mr. President, it has been a question as to whether or not goods manufactured in the United States were sold abroad at lower prices than they were sold in the United States. Some persons have asserted that to be a fact, and others have denied it. Sometimes also, Mr. President, while the fact has been admitted, it has been argued that it was nevertheless in the interest of the manufacturing enterprises of the United States that that should be the case. The object of this amendment is to determine authoritatively by an investigation by officials of the United States as to whether this statement, which has been made time and again in the public prints of the United States and in each House of Congress, is true. I submit the amendment in the hope that it may be adopted, so that we may have an authoritative investigation and a report by officials of the United States as to the truth of this allegation.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to hear the amendment again stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 154, line 4, after the word "Congress," it is proposed to insert "including information showing the wholesale and retail prices at which American-made goods are sold abroad."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not know that I shall object to that amendment, but I am somewhat surprised to hear the Senator from Texas say that it has been denied that American goods are sold abroad, in some cases, cheaper than they are sold at home. Why, Mr. President, the great Amoskeag Manufacturing Company of my State may have had a very large supply of goods on hand when this financial pinch came and there was no domestic demand for them. Does the Senator from Texas think that it would have been anything out of propriety for the Amoskeag corporation to have sold those goods abroad somewhat cheaper than the domestic price, if it had an opportunity to do so, so as to keep their employees at work? Of course they do it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I stated what I believed to be a fact, that in some instances the statement had been denied that goods manufactured in the United States had been sold abroad cheaper than in this country. In reply to the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] I give it as my opinion that even in the contingency which he mentions it is unjust to the American people for manufacturers in this country to sell goods cheaper to foreigners than to citizens of the United States, especially when they are so highly protected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, does the Senator think the Amoskeag corporation ought to have held that old stock of goods, discharged their 3,000 employees, and turned them out to the cold mercies of the world?

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Texas thinks that at least the corporation to which the Senator from New Hampshire refers ought to have sold to the American people as cheaply as they did to foreigners?

Mr. GALLINGER. They had no demand for their goods in the American market.

Mr. CULBERSON. Probably they would have had a call, Mr. President, if the price here had not been so high.

Mr. GALLINGER. They could not sell them at any price.

Now, Mr. President, there is not a nation in the world that does not do this very thing. I had occasion only a few weeks ago to write to the city of Toronto to make an inquiry concerning a manufactured article in that city. They sent me the domestic price and the export price, and the export price was 20 per cent less than the domestic price. I have conclusive information that every nation does that very thing when they find it necessary to unload goods, rather than to embarrass the manufacturing concerns; and I think they go far beyond that. I do not know what the difficulty was in Toronto, but I know that they gave me a 20 per cent export discount as compared with the domestic price.

So I think there is no controversy on that point, and for that reason I think we might as well adopt the amendment. It certainly can not do any harm. But I want to be understood as being one of those who are ready to admit that this is done, but it is done to a very insignificant extent. If the Senator will take, I think, volume 17 of the report of the Industrial Commission and look at it, he will find that they made a very exhaustive investigation, and they found that but a very inconsequential proportion of the goods manufactured in this country was sold abroad at a less price than the domestic price. It was so small that it was hardly worth considering; but it is done beyond a doubt.

Mr. ALDRICH. If it is proper that this investigation should be made, it is not proper that it should be initiated and carried on in the form of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Texas. It should be deliberately and carefully done, with all the circumstances surrounding each case, so that we might ascertain whether the policy which is adopted in certain cases is a proper policy or not. If the Senator from Texas desires to have an investigation, I will suggest to him that the proper way is to prepare a resolution directing inquiries along lines which might be carefully laid out and not undertake to inject it in this, as it seems to me, very unusual manner.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am afraid if I should introduce such a resolution, it would meet the ordinary fate of the resolutions which I have introduced, and that is burial in the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALDRICH. It would not unless the committee and the Senate thought the resolution was an improper one.

Mr. CULBERSON. I recall, Mr. President, that in the early part of this session I introduced a resolution, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance, to investigate the causes of the recent panic. The Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. ALDRICH) in open Senate promised, as I understood and construed his language, to make a report upon that resolution, but so far it is still in that committee.

The trouble about resolutions here, Mr. President, is that even when they are passed they are not answered. Six weeks ago a resolution was passed by this body calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to report the correspondence with national banks in the country that were complaining that the national banks of New York did not pay their reserves when called for, and it has never been answered. I do not know why.

But the amendment which I now propose is strictly germane, Mr. President. The bill which we have here, on page 154, provides:

> For compensation at not more than $10 per day and actual necessary traveling expenses of special agents to investigate trade conditions abroad, with the object of promoting the foreign commerce of the United States, $40,000; and the results of such investigations shall be reported to Congress.

I am not suggesting, I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island, that we shall outline here the policy of the United States, but I am simply suggesting that we shall inquire into the facts so that we may hereafter, if we see proper, outline a policy which shall be pursued. I have not even suggested, except in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], my opinion with reference to this matter. What we want are the facts. It has been denied that this condition existed. It has been denied that under a high protective tariff the people of the United States were charged a certain price for articles and that those very articles were sold to foreigners at a less price than charged to the people of the United States. Now, what is the truth about it? If that be true, let us know it, and then, if it be true, the question is whether it is a policy that ought to be pursued by the United States.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Texas that, if a circular letter were sent out to the manufacturers of this country making inquiry as to whether they sold goods under certain circumstances to foreign countries cheaper than at home, I think the universal answer would be that they do. I do not think any of them will deny it. It is good business. In my own business, I will say, that in order to keep the factory running, it occasionally becomes necessary to what we call "unload certain goods," and I believe that there is scarcely a manufacturer in this country who will deny the charge that he does sell goods cheaper in foreign countries, or in certain localities, than he does in the United States when he is overstocked, in order to keep the factories running and the employees at work, so that they may be able to feed their wives and children.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I was not suggesting to the Senator from Texas that he was not entitled to this information so far as it can be obtained in an intelligent way, but I was suggesting to him that this was not the proper way to secure the information, and that the information, if it should be received, would not cover the whole case. He simply seeks by the proposed amendment to get the relative wholesale and retail prices in foreign countries as compared with those in the United States. I would suggest to him that that is an investigation which would be endless in its character.

In the first place, no ten men or no thousand men, could cover more than a very small part of the field, and the fact that you secure the wholesale and retail prices in any particular case, without knowing the circumstances under which those prices were made and the conditions under which the exportations were made, would be of no earthly value to the Senator from Texas, or to any other Senator, in the discussion of the tariff question. And I suppose this amendment is proposed to lay a foundation for some tariff discussion hereafter. I know perfectly well that if the Senator would prepare a resolution, careful in its terms and practicable, he would have no opposition here to its adoption; but I do object to injecting into this bill, which is not a tariff bill or a bill that touches any part of the tariff, a provision of that kind, which is absolutely impracticable in its character.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not know that I differ at all from the Senator from Texas, who offers the amendment, as to the desirability of obtaining the information which he seeks, but I think this is the wrong place for the amendment. It is clearly out of order. It is general legislation, and therefore I make the point of order against it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, while some Senators on the other side admit that goods are sold to foreigners cheaper than they are in the United States, others in a sense deny it. I am not surprised, therefore, that the point of order is made; but I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that, if I am competent to construe the English language, the amendment is absolutely in order, and it is in furtherance of a provision which is already in the bill. I will read it again. This is the third time, I believe, that I have read it:

> For the compensation at not more than $10 per day and actual necessary traveling expenses of special agents—
> For what purpose?
> To investigate trade conditions abroad.

This amendment provides that they shall, in the investigation of trade conditions abroad, inquire into the question as to whether goods manufactured in the United States are sold to foreigners cheaper than to the people of the United States for whose protection the tariff laws were enacted.

I repeat, Mr. President, that if I have any comprehension of the English language, this proposed amendment is in strict furtherance of the purpose of the law which is now on the statute books, and an appropriation to carry out which is proposed by the bill under consideration.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, if this amendment should be adopted, it would be a diversion of the appropriation to a purpose never intended and which could not be properly carried out under the law as it now stands. The Senator might as well extend this inquiry to the relative cost of the production abroad and at home of specific articles or of the whole tariff schedule or to the question of wage scales or any of the various questions connected with the tariff. If he can inject this provision into this bill, he can inject the whole broad question of protection and free trade and whether the countries abroad are more prosperous under free trade than they would be under protection.

Mr. CULBERSON. No, no, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator's amendment is in order, there is no possible question involved in a tariff discussion that could not be put into this bill as an amendment or as a rider to this proposition for an appropriation.

Mr. CULBERSON. This amendment confines itself not to a policy, not to a theory, but to the discovery of a condition, to an inquiry into facts as to whether American manufactured goods are sold at lower prices to foreigners than to the people of the United States.

Mr. ALDRICH. It relates to facts, of course, but facts that are not contemplated in the original proposition, and they are no more pertinent than the facts would be as to the relative cost of production or the relative cost of wages between this country and others.

Mr. CULBERSON. The proposed law, Mr. President—and I come back to it because that is the question here—is that this appropriation shall be made to investigate trade conditions abroad; that is to say, the relationship between the United States and foreign countries as to commerce. The amendment only proposes to direct the attention of these officials to a specific inquiry as to whether or not American products are sold at lower prices in foreign countries than to the American consumer. There may arise hereafter a question as to whether or not that policy ought to be pursued, but the amendment goes to an inquiry into the facts, and not to a discussion of mere theories.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The paragraph which the Senator proposes to amend provides for an investigation as to trade conditions abroad. Does the Senator believe that by investigating trade conditions abroad they could ascertain the fact which he desires to establish? They would have to come back to the United States to find out at what price these articles were sold in the trade in the United States. There is no provision in this bill authorizing an investigation of prices in the United States. It relates purely to an investigation looking into conditions abroad, and the Senator's amendment is certainly not in order. As the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has well said, if you can do what the Senator from Texas desires to do, then you can ascertain the scale of wages paid in the United States as compared with the scale of wages paid abroad. It can not be done, however, under the present law or under this provision, because it provides wholly for investigation as to conditions abroad, and you would have to make an investigation as to prices in the United States in order to reach what the Senator from Texas seeks to ascertain.

Mr. ALDRICH. And in what part of the United States—in New York, or in San Francisco, or in every other city and town in the United States?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will rule on the point of order. The Chair is of the opinion that the subject-matter embodied in the proposed amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is in the nature of general legislation and obnoxious to subdivision 3 of Rule XVI. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, this morning when we were considering amendments of the committee I was not able to be present during all the time, and hence it was that I omitted to offer an amendment which I now desire to offer on behalf of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 147, line 20, after the word "Department," it is proposed to strike out "four thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "five thousand" so as to read:

Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I propose to offer an amendment. I will say in advance that it is subject to the point of order, but I hope it will not be made, because I think it is a very desirable thing to have done. I shall wish to say, however, a few words in reference to the matter after the amendment shall have been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, line 25, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That the Joint Committee on the Library shall cause to be removed at as early a day as practicable the fence surrounding said garden, and the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that amendment relates to the Botanic Gardens in the city of Washington, which, as I have said once or twice before, is not a credit to this great city. If any Senator will take a look at the public gardens of Boston or the gardens in Philadelphia, New York, Chicago, San Francisco, or any other city, and then make a comparison between them and the only garden that we have in the city of Washington, I think he will feel, as I have felt a great many times, that we ought to be ashamed of ourselves for not having made that garden more attractive. I think the first thing to be done, to improve its appearance at least, is to remove the unsightly fence, grade the grounds properly, and then later on we might make some more liberal appropriations to beautify it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator if this increase is recommended by a standing committee of the Senate?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not. The amendment is subject to the point of order, as I remarked a moment ago. It makes an increase.

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply want to exhibit my liberality at least and not offer objection to the amendment on the ground of its being out of order.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I have said all I care to say. I simply believe that this would be good legislation, and that we should get rid of what I think to most visitors—because I have heard scores of visitors who have come to Washington make observations in that direction, as well as many residents of the city and public men—is in the nature of an eye-sore. I think it would be a desirable thing to have the fence removed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am inclined to make the point of order on the amendment. There is a class of people in this city who are very anxious to close up and close out the Botanic Garden and devote the ground to some other purpose. If that is the purpose of the amendment I am very much opposed to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will permit me, I have no such purpose in view, nor have I been consulted by anybody concerning this matter. I made a suggestion in the same line years ago, and the late Senator from South Dakota, Mr. Kyle, I remember offered a proposition similar to this, and I have hoped for a long time that this would be done.

Mr. TELLER. I want to leave the Botanic Garden where it is. I have not any sympathy with the sentiment which proposes to destroy it and devote the ground to any other use. I do not know that it would harm the Botanic Garden to take away the fence, but there are some advantages I think in keeping it there. At all events, I am going to make the point of order on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, in line 12, page 155, I move to strike out "$1,400" and insert "$1,600."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 155, line 12, after the words "stenographer to Chief of Bureau" [of Manufactures], strike out "one thousand four hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "one thousand six hundred."

Mr. DANIEL. This amendment is in accordance with the estimate to be found on page 158 of the Estimates of Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. On page 44, line 21, after the words "assistant chief of division, two thousand," I move to insert "five hundred." This increase is to be found in the Book of Estimates, and is at the urgent request of the Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 44, line 21, after the words "assistant chief of division," strike out "two thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPAYMENT OF CERTAIN COMMISSIONS.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15660) to provide for the repayment of certain commissions, excess payments, and purchase moneys paid under the public land laws.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that where purchase moneys and commissions paid under any public land law have been or shall hereafter be covered into the Treasury under any application to make any filing, location, selection, entry, or proof, such moneys shall be repaid to the person who made such application, entry, or proof, or to his legal representatives, in all cases where such application, entry, or proof has been or shall hereafter be rejected, and neither such applicant nor his legal representatives shall have been guilty of any fraud or attempted fraud in connection with such application.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That sections 7, 8, 9, 13, and 14 of the trade-mark law be, and the same are hereby, amended so that the sections shall, respectively, read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That in all cases where notice of opposition has been filed the Commissioner of Patents shall notify the applicant thereof and the grounds therefor.

"Whenever application is made for the registration of a trade-mark which is substantially identical with a trade-mark appropriated to goods of the same descriptive porperties for which a certificate of registration has been previously issued to another, or for registration of which another has previously made application, or which so nearly resembles such trade-mark or a known trade-mark owned and used by another, as is, in the opinion of the Commissioner, to be likely to be mistaken therefor by the public, he may declare that an interference exists as to such trade-mark; and in every case of interference or opposition to registration he shall direct the examiner in charge of interferences to determine the question of the right of registration to such trade-mark and of the sufficiency of objections to registration in such manner and upon such notice to those interested as the Commissioner may by rules prescribe.

"The Commissioner may refuse to register the mark against the registration of which objection is filed, or may refuse to register both of two interfering marks, or may register the mark as a trade-mark for the person first to adopt and use the mark, if otherwise entitled to register the same, unless an appeal is taken, as hereinafter provided for, from the decision of the examiner of trade-marks and the examiner of interferences to the board of appeals, by a party interested in the proceeding, within such time (not less than twenty days) as the Commissioner may prescribe.

"SEC. 8. That every applicant for the registration of a trade-mark or for the renewal of the registration of a trade-mark, which application is refused, or a party to an interference against whom a decision has been rendered, or a party who has filed a notice of opposition as to a trade-mark, may appeal from the decision of the examiner in charge of trade-marks or the examiner in charge of interferences, as the case may be, to the board of appeals (Rev. Stats., U. S., p. 482), having once paid the fee for such appeal.

"SEC. 9. That if an applicant for registration of a trade-mark or a party to an interference as to a trade-mark, or a party who has filed opposition to the registration of a trade-mark, or a party to an application for the cancellation of the registration of a trade-mark is dissatisfied with the decision of the board of appeals, he may appeal to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia on complying with the conditions required in case of an appeal from the decision of the board of appeals by an applicant for patent or a party to an interference as to an invention, and the same rules of practice and procedure shall govern in every stage of such proceedings as far as the same may be applicable.

"SEC. 13. That whenever any person shall deem himself injured by the registration of a trade-mark in the Patent Office he may at any time apply to the Commissioner of Patents to cancel the registration thereof. The Commissioner shall refer such application to the examiner of interferences, who is empowered to hear and determine this question, and who shall give notice thereof to the registrant. If it appear, after a hearing before the examiner, that the registrant was not entitled to the use of the mark at the date of his application for registration thereof, or that the mark is not used by the registrant or has been abandoned, and the examiner shall so decide, the Commissioner shall cancel the registration. Appeal may be taken to the board of appeals from the decision of the examiner of interferences.

"SEC. 14. That the following shall be the rates for trade-mark fees:

"On filing each original application for registration of a trade-mark, $10: Provided, That an application for registration of a trade-mark pending on April 1, 1905, and on which certificate of registration shall not have issued at such date, may, at the option of the applicant, be proceeded with and registered under the provisions of this act without the payment of further fee.

"On filing each application for renewal of the registration of a trade-mark, $10.

"On filing notice of opposition to the registration of a trade-mark, $10.

"On an appeal from the examiner in charge of trade-marks to the board of appeals, $15.

"On an appeal from the decision of the examiner in charge of interferences, awarding ownership of a trade-mark or canceling the registration of a trade-mark, to the board of appeals, $15.

"For certified and uncertified copies of certificates of registration and other papers, and for recording transfers and other papers, the same fees as required by law for such copies of patents and for recording assignments and other papers relating to patents."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect July 1, 1908, but shall not apply to any case in which the appeal to the Commissioner of Patents was taken prior to that date. In such case the appeal shall be taken to and determined by the Commissioner of Patents and the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, as the case may be, as provided by law, prior to July 1, 1908.

Mr. CARTER. This seems to be a bill of far-reaching importance. It seems to me it might well be withheld.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that the bill simply applies to appeals as to trade-marks, the provisions of the bill which passed the Senate in respect to patent cases. In other words, the appeal from the examiner on trade-marks is to the courts mentioned in the bill which passed the Senate the other day.

Mr. CARTER. It controls the procedure without going into the merits of any rights?

Mr. SMOOT. No rights whatever are affected.

Mr. CARTER. I shall not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the act entitled "An act to provide for the extension of New Hampshire avenue, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved February 27, 1907, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out section 3 thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. WANGER in the chair.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to go into, or to attempt any discussion of, this fortifications bill. I do not rise to criticise it. It has been carefully prepared, after full hearings, by the subcommittee having the subject in charge. It perhaps carries more appropriation for the Hawaiian Territory and Philippine Islands than the conditions there now warrant, in view of the fact that there has been no definite, set policy or plans, either through legislation or otherwise, as to the character of the improvements and fortifications that should be made in these remote but important places. If there is any criticism of the Committee on Appropriations for not making more adequate appropriations for fortifications and defense, it must be because of what I have stated.

I do believe that we have wasted large sums of money from year to year in attempting to provide defenses on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and other places, because we make appropriations without plans, pretending to do certain things that can not be done by the engineers and officers in charge of the improvements. In other words, they are not completed, and hence the money is spent from year to year and little is accomplished. This observation may be said to apply to the twenty years preceding this one.

I intended, however, Mr. Chairman, to say a word about the great importance of providing a defense somewhere in the Pacific Ocean that would be of a substantial character against all possible comers. The Hawaiian Territory, and especially Honolulu, was acquired, as has been stated here, for the purpose of giving us a naval base, or a military base, if you please, that would be useful in protecting our long line of Pacific coast.

Honolulu has a peculiar location. It is in longitude 157° and 52′ west of Greenwich. The longitude of Manila is 120° 58′ east of Greenwich. The longitude of Washington is 77° 03′ 56″ west. The longitude of San Francisco is 122° 23′ 30″ west. Honolulu is 35° 28′ 30″ west of San Francisco, or about 2,100 geographical miles west of that city. Manila is about 81°, or about 5,000 geographical miles, westward of Honolulu, though still farther eastward than Japan or China. If we fortify some place in the Hawaiian Territory where we can take our war ships, or a few of them, in safety, and have a harbor and naval base, if you please, and can hold it as permanently as England holds Gibraltar, it will be absolutely impossible for any oriental country, however strong it may be in its navy or army, or in both, to assail our Pacific coast. We may need such a base to enable us to defend our Philippine possessions. Such a naval base, I believe, can be created at a reasonable cost, comparatively.

No naval fleet will sail by Honolulu or Pearl Harbor and go to the Pacific coast, however defenseless it may be, if we have one or two or more battle ships at Honolulu or in Pearl Harbor. It would not dare to leave this small number of battle ships in its rear, as they would cut off all communication with and all necessary transportation from its home country, such as coal, ammunition, provisions, and other absolutely requisite supplies for a fleet. Certain disaster would inevitably befall a fleet, however large, should it disregard so well-established a principle of war, either in naval or army campaigns or expeditions.

A fleet of the largest size that would leave its communication liable to be cut and its transports to be seized or destroyed and its communications with its government made impossible would soon be overtaken with disaster, even though it met no fleet of a strength equal to cope with it.

So long as we successfully hold Pearl Harbor and have in it a small fleet our Pacific coast will be absolutely free from invasion or attack. With Pearl Harbor as a naval station, our fleet in the Pacific may be minimized. It will prove to be wise economy to make Pearl Harbor a Gibraltar of strength.

Napoleon in his invasion of Russia and march upon Moscow left in fortified places in his rear nearly 200,000 of his 400,000 French and allied forces, and but for this his entire army would have been cut off and destroyed in the wilds of Russia. But this is not the time or place to discuss military strategy.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly; though I have but little time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to ask the gentleman—I believe the statement he made is correct—if that is true, if an impregnable fortress at Hawaii makes it impossible for an oriental power, no matter how great, to attack the Pacific coast, does not that obviate the necessity for the extraordinary increase in the Navy?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is trying to anticipate the point of my speech. [Laughter.] I think that if we have a naval base such as can easily be constructed on the island of Oahu, near Honolulu, at Pearl Harbor, the most remarkable one naturally in the world, we can dispense with a very considerable number of battle ships that we are now proposing to construct, and we can do this very much more cheaply than we can build battle ships, though I am in favor of building a reasonable number of them.

In this connection I might add that if we would stop long enough to make a definite plan and close up the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay, we could also dispense with a great portion of our battle ships on the Atlantic coast. None would ever be needed in Chesapeake Bay. By doing the latter we need not keep up fortifications inside of the bay or on the Chesapeake that are now practically useless, although we are spending large sums of money upon them every year to maintain them.

Pearl Harbor, it is said, needs a great deal of money expended on the channel. I do not believe it. I do not care whether the Engineer Department of the Army or whether the Taft board or the Endicott board have recommended it or not. Pearl Harbor is now almost accessible with our large battle ships, and if we would straighten out a few places in that remarkable channel we could go in there and come out of there whenever we pleased and be entirely safe. There is a sufficient depth of water at all times in the channel, as well as in the harbor. When you are in Pearl Harbor—and I speak from personal knowledge and observation—you can not see the ocean.

The heights of projecting lands on the sides of the tortuous channel completely shut the harbor from view from the ocean. Vessels once in there are protected from any naval attack from any source. The channel is the important thing to keep open, of course, to give ingress and egress to the harbor, but when in Pearl Harbor, if we had all the navies in the world there, we could find a quiet resting place for them, whence they could sail out and do their work by giving battle or in the manner I have undertaken to state. Pearl Harbor is located not exactly at Honolulu, but when you are in Pearl Harbor and in one of the wings of it, so to speak, you are near Honolulu on one side and partly to the rear of it. Honolulu and Pearl Harbor are now in close touch by land. So it is in communication by land with Honolulu. We talk about defending the harbor of Honolulu, and the bill provides for putting in defenses there, putting more guns on Diamond Head. This may be necessary, though they will simply face the great Pacific Ocean. There is no harbor there except an open sea, and it is impossible to protect Honolulu from Diamond Head. Anywhere along the coast you may put up defenses, and if ships are foolish enough to come within range of the guns you might harm them, but not otherwise, and so of guns in position at Diamond Head or at Waikiki. They would not protect Honolulu or ships in its open harbor. I have only to add that we should adopt a definite plan for establishing a naval base at Honolulu, and we need not, I think, expend a very large amount of money, compared with that required to build battle ships. We should straighten and open the channel into Pearl Harbor and make the harbor a safe base and refuge for our ships of all kinds. This done we would secure cheaply and safely our Pacific coast and furnish a base for the protection and defense of the Philippine Islands. Should we lose Pearl Harbor as a base, the Philippines would also be lost.

We owe much to the Hawaiian Territory, especially to the loyal Hawaiians, who have given up their own government, and now, with singular and patriotic zeal, are devoted to our Constitution, our flag, and our institutions.

Mr. Chairman, following the better example of the Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico [Mr. TULIO LARRINAGA], I will now ask unanimous consent to extend my "ideas" on this subject in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five mintues to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, while my indorsement of the project for the fortification of Pearl Harbor is measured in value only by my vote, it gives me pleasure to find myself, once at least, in cordial sympathy with the proposition for an unusual military outlay.

However, Mr. Chairman, my object in taking the floor this morning was for an entirely different purpose. I regret that my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] is not present. I had hoped to find him here and to rejoice with him at the news which I mean to give him. I take the floor for the purpose of inviting his attention to a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I am sure will gratify him.

A few days ago he seemed distressed at the fact that there was a large cash balance in the Treasury, and, by implication at least, he preferred extravagant appropriations as a means of getting rid of it rather than a reduction of the taxes collected. On the 24th of February, while the House in Committee of the Whole House was considering the bill for the support of the Army, and while I was protesting in my feeble way against extravagance, he asked if "there is any other way in which the $260,000,000 available cash balance could be reduced to a normal point," which he "believed should not exceed $50,000,000, than by allowing expenditures to exceed revenues?"

I told him at the time that I thought he might dismiss his fears, and that the way things were going under a Republican Administration we would soon reach the normal he desired. When I read the Treasury statement that reached me this morning, I at once thought of my friend and of how gratified he would be to see it.

At the close of business yesterday the expenses of the Government for the current fiscal year exceeded the income of the Government by exactly $33,741,032.62, and the deficit of the day was $645,796.87. At that rate it will take exactly three hundred and twenty-six days to reduce us to an available balance of $50,000,000, and in four hundred and four days we will be scraping the bottom of the national money chest. Adding fifty-seven

Sundays to the four hundred and four days it will take to break us completely, it appears that we can keep on a cash basis for one year and three months.

All this will be pleasant reading for my friend from Illinois, but how it will strike my other friend, the gentleman from Minnesota, I leave the House to judge.

Perhaps it will help to still further confuse the scores of contributors to the Washington Times who are trying to solve the riddle propounded by that paper, to wit, "When will Chairman TAWNEY bring in a bill to increase the pay of the Department clerks?"

Mr. Chairman, I hope he will soon find a solution to it, because I do not like the illustrations in that paper. [Laughter.] My friend is a handsome man, and he stands his ground firmly. The illustration represents him in full flight from a single enemy, perhaps induced by his inability to answer the question.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to confine myself closely to the bill under consideration, for a number of reasons, one of which is that I do not know very much about the subject. I note, among other things, however—not particularly from the bill, but from what I gather outside—that we have a new policy with reference to fortifications in the Philippines. It was once determined that the right place to have a safe harbor of refuge and a mighty fortress is at Subic Bay—Olongapo. Now, I believe the conclusion has been reached—not hastily, however, nor until after we had expended several million dollars uselessly—that it would be better to have the naval station at Cavite and make our fortifications somewhere around the bay of Manila. A good many contended, when the subject was up from time to time in the House, that, as Manila is the largest city in the Philippines and as Cavite is the station adjacent to Manila and as Corregidor Island commands the narrow passage to the great bay of Manila, fortifications could be and should be constructed that would protect Manila in time of stress; that about Corregidor would seem to be the place for fortifications, rather than at the somewhat distant and thoroughly isolated Subic Bay. It is only after experimentation, as I stated before, involving a cost and waste of a good many million dollars, that we are swinging back to Cavite and Corregidor. I congratulate the committee and the country upon this measure of progress. Perhaps it would not be generous, and certainly it would be useless, to express regret that the plain, practicable, sensible thing to be done, if we are to fortify over there at all, was not done earlier, at a saving of the great amount of money which has been lost about Subic Bay.

Before turning from the subject, let me say that I wish to convict one of my friends of being something of a prophet concerning the Olongapo fiasco. A great many of our friends utter prophecies, and time prevents a conviction of them as prophets, because in most instances the prophecy is demonstrated not to be true, but to be false. But my friend from Virginia [Mr. JONES] upon different occasions spoke upon this subject, discussing the relative merits of Olongapo and Manila Bay and Cavite, and I wish to incorporate some of his remarks with my own.

This is from his speech of February 13, 1906:

> Everybody who knows anything about the Philippine Islands knows that if we are to hold them permanently we must hold and fortify against attack the city of Manila. The possession of Manila is absolutely essential to the possession and control of the Philippine Archipelago. I think, however, Mr. Chairman, that I perceive in the settled purpose of our military and naval authorities to establish this naval station at Olongapo, in Subic Bay, an indication that the Administration and the Republican party intend at some not far distant day to relinquish control over the Philippines and grant to the Filipinos their independence. Acting upon that theory, I should be inclined to favor a naval station at Olongapo, notwithstanding the many and valid objections which, in my opinion, are to be urged against that location, so anxious am I to hasten the hour when we shall withdraw from the Philippines, both for their and our own good.
> The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has told us a good deal about Subic Bay and the conditions that exist there. He admits that he has no personal knowledge as to the situation, and even declares that he has no desire ever to see the islands. His only knowledge consists in what he has been told. If, then, he has given us the benefit of all that other people have told him upon the subject, he most certainly has not told half the story. There is not, Mr. Chairman, in my humble judgment, 5 acres of level ground bordering upon Subic Bay suitable for the location of a naval station. The only level ground that I know of there is at the point where, I believe, it is proposed to construct this naval station. It is a low, marshy piece of ground, very limited in extent, and only 2 feet above sea level, so that in order to secure the solid and level ground upon which to build a naval station at that point—and it is the only point on the bay where one can be built—it will not only be necessary to cut down the side of a mountain that rises abruptly out of the bay, but it will also be absolutely necessary to raise the little level ground now available by placing upon it material which must be dredged from the bay in order to secure a sufficient depth of water to accommodate our ships.
> In addition to this, Mr. Chairman, there is a stream rushing down the side of that mountain and dashing across the very spot where the naval station is to be located, or, rather, where it is proposed to locate it, so that before the work of building a site for this station is begun it will be necessary to divert the course of that stream so as to carry the water in some other direction. Mr. Chairman, there is still another objection to Olongapo, which I have not yet heard alluded to. It is a fact known to everybody who knows anything about conditions in those islands that the fall of water at Olongapo far exceeds that at Cavite or at any other point in that section of Luzon. It is, indeed, quite phenomenal. It rains there every day of the year, and when it rains it pours in torrents, so that it will require the expenditure of a great deal of money merely for protective works, even after the station has been established at an enormous expenditure.

Thus spake the gentleman from Virginia, with the insight of the true prophet.

We have been wondering for a good while, Mr. Chairman, what might be done, should be done, or could be done to make the Philippines, euphoniously denominated our "new possessions," an asset instead of a liability. Thus far no solution has been found. We have poured many millions out of the Treasury of the United States into the seas and morasses over there. At one time we were to get a great trade from the Philippines; their acquisition was to be of great advantage commercially. It was discovered, however, by some gentlemen sufficiently influential to accomplish their purpose, that trade with the Philippines might interfere with some of the monopolies at home, and therefore, of course, we have denied to the Filipinos and to the American people decent trade intercourse between the two countries, much to our disadvantage and greatly to their disadvantage.

So that phantom of trade profits vanished into thin air.

Then we were going to "elevate" the Filipinos, forgetful of the fact which all history teaches that a people to be elevated must elevate itself; that a people can not be brought up or made great by the agency of some other people. And we have been greatly perplexed about the inability of the Filipinos, as asserted, to govern themselves. We know precisely what self-government is, and we know, so it is said, that the Filipinos can not measure up to the requirements of making and carrying on a government of their own. Notwithstanding all that, however, all about us are governments, so called in polite diplomatic phrase, which are mere travesties upon government. Down at Haiti, in San Domingo, the Central American States, and many of the South American States are governments which, measured by the standard that we apply to the Filipinos, are utter and absolute failures. Still we are governing the Filipinos as we please, upon the theory that they are not fit to govern themselves—except as they please.

Mr. Chairman, for lack of time I will pass from subjects relating directly to our failure in the Philippines to accomplish anything of substantial advantage to our people, and will suggest to the House, if I may do so, a useful purpose to which I think Filipino land might be dedicated and devoted.

Why not raise over in the Philippines, instead of seeking in other lands, the necessary quantum of barons and dukes and counts and other titled bipeds? [Applause on the Democratic side.] By choice I say "raise" when I might say "rear." Now, this would be a domestic industry against which, it seems to me, there ought to be no objection. [Applause and laughter.] There would be no trouble in negotiating with our home-made dukes, as, with our plant established in the Philippines for turning out hombres with titles, we could fix our own schedules, and ourselves determine what we shall pay for the privilege of exporting, in this instance to the Philippines, such of our daughters as we desire to part with, accompanied by a right handsome dot in the way of consideration for a title of nobility of some grade or another thus brought into the family.

Now, why could we not turn the Philippines to account in this way? Why contribute of our millions to titled gentlemen in Europe in order to dispose of the daughters of our American millionaires? Why longer suffer ourselves to be held up and robbed, even to make a countess or some other sort of titled lady out of the daughter of an American plutocrat? It will be cheaper far to bring up our own titled gentry, under our own control, and I think it would be in harmony—I say it with some diffidence, because I do not exactly know—I think it would be in harmony with the protective policy to which our friends across the aisle are devoted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As it is at present there is, in a most substantial sense, an export duty upon American heiresses sent to foreign parts. That seems to be contrary to a provision of the Constitution, but what is the Constitution when it comes to getting a titled son-in-law and husband for the family tree, for just a few hundred thousand dollars! So I need not suggest anything about the constitutional consideration. But let us get into the industry of raising noblemen in the Philippines. Those islands have a climate that I am sure will happily promote the growth of such a product, such a crop. Then we can have lordlings, dukies, counters, and so forth, and so forth, in great variety, as well as in great abundance. It is true that the Creator of us all has long been engaged in the work of making noblemen, but he does not tag them, and so leaves every one of them free to make manifest his God-given nobility, in life and deed, with the world to learn of it in the world's many ways. But it is not of such noblemen that I am speaking just now. Nor am I considering certain high grades of nobility by grace of the king, in recognition of the divine handiwork. I am discoursing upon a necessity, a prime necessity; that commercial nobility which many Americans have been buying, the consideration being one daughter and many dollars. That is the nobility which we might profitably raise in the Philippines.

I have said that the Philippines can be made to supply us with the titled commodity in great abundance and in great variety. To begin with, we have over there much of variety in the aborigines. Then there is the stock of the proud grandee of old Spain, of the bold Briton, of the sturdy German, of the adventurous Frenchman. In the southern group of islands we find the warlike Moros, weighted down with titles, many of them ancient enough to fascinate the proud American papa with a daughter and a few millions to dispose of. Why, there is the Sultan of Sulu, whom we hired some time ago to do nothing for good pay. And Dato This, and Dato That, and Dato The Other—datos to burn, or to buy! Even now there are grand titles in our "new possessions" going to waste, like other Philippine products, for want of a market, while we are buying in Europe, contrary to the fundamental principles of our protective policy. As titles of nobility such as our millionaries must have in the family, whatever the cost, are made to order, we have but to make them, to meet the large and growing demand.

While by no means disposed to exhaust the subject, for such a subject should never be exhausted, I will pause for a moment's attention, in anticipation, as it were, to one objection which some evil-minded person, hostile to our protective-tariff system, and possibly in the employ of some importer, might raise. Of course I mean the possible but insufficient objection that the Philippine output of the titled commodity would be too fresh; would lack the somewhat pungent, somewhat musty flavor of decay. There is nothing in such an objection. We can readily and in a number of different ways give to our wares the touch of antiquity, as it is said rectifiers "age" whisky. There is no insurmountable difficulty in the way of attaching the distinguishing characteristic of seediness to our Philippine-grown nobility. Besides, in cases where an exacting, fond American parent, with a daughter and millions, and without a nobleman, may be pleased to demand more of the sere and yellow leaf of decay, we can make a patent of nobility for a long-departed ancestor, and antedate it.

The precious document can easily be tinged and dimmed with an up-to-date touch of the long ago. There will be no occasion for delivery, or attempted delivery, to the vanished ancestor, honored in his dust as well as in his progeny—the parchment may be handed to the young or middle-aged or old new nobleman, as the case may be; and they may live happily ever after—certainly as happily as should be expected. But for a prohibition contained in our Constitution we could make and affix titles here in our native land, and send the product abroad to age and become mellow. In the Philippines there is no constitutional hindrance.

So let us raise nobles and bring forth titles in the Philippines, just as we need them, and then we can apply the protective tariff policy and impose a high, and, if you please, a prohibitive, duty upon titled gentlemen from everywhere outside of our own possessions—our "new possessions."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I am sorry it has, because I would like to extend my remarks upon this subject. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill appropriates more money for seacoast fortifications than has ever been carried in a bill of this character in time of peace. It carries in round numbers the sum of $8,200,000. It carries $30,200,000 less than the estimates, and the percentage of reduction in the estimates is the largest ever made in a general appropriation bill presented to this House. We are not advised whether any attack will be made upon this bill, and if it is to be attacked we are not advised whether it will be attacked because it appropriates more money than usual in time of peace or because it appropriates so small a percentage of the amount asked for by the War Department. We are, therefore, at a loss to know whether we should defend the bill as against the charge that it is too high or defend it against the charge that it is too low.

In our day we have a carriage for great guns which provides for an all-round fire, and our hope is to be able to defend this bill, whether attacked as appropriating too much or too little.

It is my purpose to briefly review the work provided for by this bill.

It provides for the completion of the fortifications at Deception Pass, thereby thoroughly fortifying, so far as heavy ordnance may be concerned, every important point on the Pacific coast except at San Diego, where the harbor is not yet deep enough to require more than is now provided, but will in the future, after the deepening of the channel, require further appropriations at that point.

We have, then, passed to the Hawaiian Islands. There has been much talk about the fortifications at the entrance of Pearl Harbor. This is a map [indicating] of the much talked of Pearl Harbor, and this is the channel [indicating] extending into that harbor, as shown upon the map before you. This channel is not so winding in the shore lines as it is beneath the surface of the water, where coral reefs project to such a degree that I am advised that no vessel of more than 700 tons has ever gone into Pearl Harbor under its own power. This is one of the most spacious harbors in the world and is the seat of a great American naval station in the future. The sole question is as to the orderly method of the establishment of that naval station. After the Congress has appropriated the money for the dry dock in Pearl Harbor and the other essentials of the naval base and has provided the money to open this channel, then the Committee on Appropriations will be ready to report appropriations for the complete defense of the entrance to that harbor.

At the present there are 12-inch guns provided for and in course of emplacement at the entrance to Pearl channel. Nothing has been recommended further for the defense of the entrance of this harbor save mortars at the same general location. The committee has not thought it necessary to provide these mortars until further steps have been taken for the opening of the channel and the establishment of the naval base at this harbor. The committee have put into this bill all the great guns provided for the defense of Honolulu in the Taft board's report, so that the defense provided for by the Taft report on the Hawaiian Islands will in this bill be complete except for mortars at the entrance of Pearl Harbor and some additional 3-inch guns for the purpose of protecting submarine mine defenses and the like.

I have here a map showing Subic Bay and Manila Bay. Everyone now agrees that Subic Bay is the better location for a naval station of these two if it could be defended against land attacks. In the ten years since the Spanish war the joint board has always decided that Subic Bay was the proper place for a naval base until this year. This year the War Department, having reported that Subic Bay can not be defended against land attack without an army of 100,000 men upon the heights about the bay, the Navy Department was compelled to yield and consent to the project to remove the naval station to Manila Bay.

In the entrance to Subic Bay is Grande Island, the site for fortification for Subic Bay, and its fortification is essential, whether the naval station is to be in Subic Bay or in Manila Bay, because without the defense and fortification of Subic Bay it becomes a harbor of refuge for any nation that wishes to put its fleet therein. The defense of the mouth of Manila Bay can be made on four different isolated islands—Corregidor, Carabao, Caballo, and El Fraile—which are better shown on the map now displayed [indicating]. Here are the islands of Corregidor, Carabao, Caballo, and El Fraile [illustrating]. It will be observed that Caballo and El Fraile are farther into the entrance of the bay and closer together than Corregidor and Carabao. Corregidor is an island of very considerable extent, sufficient upon which to place a whole army, and it has been fortified in large measure already, and the appropriations carried in this bill will complete its fortification. This bill also carries money enough for the completion of the fortification of Carabao Island.

Mr. DOUGLAS. How far is that from the shore?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. A very short distance. The distance between Carabao and Corregidor will be fairly protected by the fortification of those two islands, but more efficiently protected with the fortifications that are to be at Caballo and El Fraile.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the distance between these three islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The distance clear across is 8 miles.

Mr. GRAFF. Seven miles between the large islands.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Carabao is the next island we will undertake to fortify, because it was the judgment of the War Department and our own judgment that that will completely command the main channel, as well as the side channels.

El Fraile is an expensive project. The island is not large enough to sustain the fortifications, and must be enlarged, at a cost of more than $3,000,000, and we did not feel like entering upon that project at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. How large is Caballo, the second island?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have not the area of it, because we did not consider fortifying it at this session, but it is large enough to hold the fortifications without artificial enlargement.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would not Caballo and Carabao control the entrance?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not so fully as with El Fraile also fortified. I think it will be well defended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How large is El Fraile?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. About 170 feet long and 70 feet wide. Now the fortifications which are already installed at Corregidor, or provided for in this bill, consist of six 12-inch guns, two 10-inch guns, twelve 12-inch mortars, five 6-inch guns, and four 3-inch guns; those provided by this bill for Carabao will be two 14-inch guns and eight 12-inch mortars.

Mr. SULZER. How large is Carabao Island?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I could not give you the acreage, but it is abundant for carrying the fortifications. There is no project to enlarge any island except El Fraile.

Mr. GRAFF. The island is 3½ miles long.

Mr. SULZER. Carabao Island?

Mr. GRAFF. No; I thought the gentleman asked about Corregidor.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, I want to say just a word in justification of the act of this committee in the amount that is appropriated. To appropriate less than the amount given would not complete any distinctive works. To give greatly more than we have given would have indicated that we believed there were threatening conditions now existing. I have seen it stated in the press that in cutting these appropriations we had fear of giving offense to Japan. That is not a correct statement of the proposition. We are at peace with Japan, and the committee believe that we are to remain at peace with Japan. We are not in fear of war with Japan, and we believed that at a time when there was a great national deficit to appropriate five times as much as has ever been appropriated in any one year for fortification purposes would be a false assertion that we did anticipate war with Japan, which we do not expect and which we do not believe is approaching. Because of that fact, not because we feared to offend Japan, not because we feared Japan or any other power, but because we did not think it proper, with a great national deficit, to proclaim untruly that we were anticipating early war with Japan, we determined to proceed with these fortifications in the same orderly way that we have been proceeding for twenty years, increasing them only so much as might be necessary to finish great distinctive works, and to bring the fortifications of the Pacific and the insular possessions up to the standard of fortifications in continental United States upon the Atlantic and Gulf coasts.

Now, unless some questions are desired to be asked——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the gentleman whether the fact that the War Department requested $30,000,000 more than the committee recommended indicates that the Department disagrees with the committee as to the prospect of trouble with Japan?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think not, for this reason: These estimates were made early last year, when the Department might have had some possible idea of possible trouble. They were made at a time when there was a great surplus of revenues over expenditures. The difference between the time when the estimates were made and the time at which we fixed the amounts to recommend for appropriation fully accounts, in my judgment, for the difference between the two.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for my information?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it or not true that the estimate of the Department contemplated really work that would be continuous for several years, and is it not true that the appropriation that you have made is not necessarily inconsistent with the estimates?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is true, and will be well illustrated by this very matter of El Fraile Island. In the estimates of the fortifications on El Fraile were included estimates for all sums necessary for the installation of electrical fire control to be used in controlling and operating the guns hereafter to be authorized to be erected in emplacements not yet erected on El Fraile Island. That money could not have been spent in ten years so far as that item was concerned, which was asked for by the Department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I surrender back what time I have remaining and ask for the reading of the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BURKE). If there is no further demand for debate, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction of mining casemates, cable galleries, torpedo storehouses, cable tanks, and other structures necessary for the operation, preservation, and care of submarine mines and their accessories, $175,000, to be expended by the Engineer Department.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. Is there any provision in this bill that is contemplated to be used for the fortification of Deception Pass, Puget Sound?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is covered, is it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Wholly covered.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the committee for fifteen minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, yesterday the House had before it a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] calling on the President for certain information which has been collected by the Bureau of Corporations——

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the matter before the committee.

Mr. SULZER. I do not have to do that; I was granted fifteen minutes by unanimous consent.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; to talk on the bill.

Mr. SULZER. Not at all; I asked unanimous consent to speak, and that was granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to be governed by the rule. The gentleman from New York asked unanimous consent to address the committee for fifteen minutes, the intimation clearly being that he would address himself to the matter before the committee, and under the rule the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I take exception to the ruling. I asked for fifteen minutes to address the committee and it was granted. If the Chair is going to rule that way, I take exception to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from New York appeals from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. SULZER. I do not care to take up the time of the House by an appeal, but I renew my request for fifteen minutes to address the committee in order to correct the RECORD. I wanted to correct the record of the House yesterday and asked for five minutes' time to do so, but a Republican Member [Mr. MANN], who gave utterance to a matter on the floor of the House in the debate yesterday which the RECORD does not sustain, objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for fifteen minutes on a matter not under consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SULZER. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that he will not make any progress with the bill by objecting. I want fifteen minutes now, and if it is not granted I will take up more than fifteen minutes. I will speak on the bill now, then I will speak again for five minutes, and then again for five minutes, until the gentleman finds out that he is making little progress.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes on the bill.

Mr. SULZER. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of discussing the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair then understand the gentleman from New York to withdraw his request for unanimous consent?

Mr. SULZER. No; I renew my request for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has secured unanimous consent to proceed for fifteen minutes and to discuss the question under consideration. That consent having already been granted, if the gentleman confines himself to the subject under consideration he may proceed.

Mr. SULZER. I desire fifteen minutes to discuss a matter in connection with the debate of yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York will wait until the bill is completed under the five-minute rule, I have no objection to his having fifteen minutes to discuss any matter before the committee rises.

Mr. SULZER. I suppose somebody else will then object.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; I have no reason to think they will. I have no objection, but I can not have this bill interrupted now——

Mr. SULZER. What difference does it make whether I take up the time now or later?

Mr. BURLESON. I will suggest to the gentleman from New York that he submit his request at this time.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that when the reading of the bill is finished I be allowed fifteen minutes to address the committee on a matter relating to the creation of the Bureau of Corporations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of the reading of the bill, and after the bill has been laid aside with a favorable recommendation, he be granted fifteen minutes for the purpose of addressing the committee on a subject not now under consideration. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MUDD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6235. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the Executive Departments," approved February 16, 1889, and the act amendatory thereof, approved March 2, 1895;

S. 3939. An act for the widening of Sixteenth street NW. at Piney Branch, and for other purposes; and

S. 28. An act to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4046) to authorize the cutting of timber, the manufacture and sale of lumber, and the preservation of the forests on the Menominee Indian Reservation, in the State of Wisconsin.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the Philippine Islands, $954,000; in all, $1,354,000.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understood from him that the Navy Department has abandoned the position which it took a year or two ago in favor of protecting and defending Olongapo and Subic Bay instead of making permanent fortifications for the protection of Manila Bay. Is that correct?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is true that the joint board has recommended the transfer of the naval station from Subic Bay to Manila Bay, but it is not true that anybody recommends the abandonment of the fortifications provided for Subic Bay, which are already provided for and not carried in this bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. How much is provided for the protection of Subic Bay?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Nothing in this bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. In former bills?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would have to give a very rough estimate. There never was anything appropriated explicitly for that.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Was there not a vote here indicating the will of Congress that Subic Bay should be fortified instead of Manila Bay?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, never.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The gentleman does not think it meant that?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, never.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The gentleman does not know how much money is now appropriated for fortifications in the Philippines which may be expended at Subic Bay.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Everything provided for in the Taft board plans and which is expected to be put in at Subic Bay is already being put in under the appropriations heretofore made.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to know when the naval board surrendered to the military board on this question of Manila Bay in place of Subic Bay.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. They never surrendered, except in the sense that the Army board having reported it would take 100,000 men to protect the heights around Subic Bay, and it being well understood that we could not keep an army of 100,000 men for that purpose, they then yielded and went to the inferior harbor.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Would not that depend somewhat on how many men there are on the other side on the heights surrounding Subic Bay?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; it is simply this proposition: One who is guarding a wide territory, with no knowledge of where attack is to be made, is, as the gentleman realizes, surrounded by some difficulties. A small force could strike the line of defense anywhere about Subic Bay, and to complete the defense it would require 100,000 men, even as against a small force.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Has this surrender been made on the theory that our Government has adopted the policy of maintaining Cavite and Manila and Manila Bay permanently?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I can only say in reply to that that I can not tell what is in the mind of every Army and Navy officer who has voted on this proposition. The Navy Department insists that Subic Bay is infinitely superior to Manila Bay for a naval station. Army officers insist that Subic Bay can not be practicably defended against a land attack.

Mr. DRISCOLL. That Manila Bay is superior?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Subic Bay is superior. The naval officers, I say, insist that Subic Bay is infinitely superior to Manila Bay as a naval base. Then comes the question of defense against a land attack, which is an Army proposition, and the Army men insist that it can not be adequately defended without 100,000 men.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Are these plans and fortifications made up with an idea of the permanent occupation of Manila Bay and of Cavite?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will try to make it plain to the gentleman. Appropriations have been made for the Philippine Islands for their defense. Everything which it is now contemplated will ever be at Subic Bay has already been installed or is in course of installation. Every appropriation granted for the Philippine Islands from now on goes to Manila, not to defend it as a naval base alone, but to defend it as the capital of the Philippine Islands and a large center of population.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I understand, but it seemed to be the concensus of opinion of this House in the last Congress that the large appropriations for permanent fortifications on one place or the other should be made, so that if we should abandon the balance of the archipelago we might maintain and retain that place for a permanent naval and military station. The record shows that Subic Bay was approved as the locality to be permanently improved and retained. I want to know if that policy has been abandoned.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman has put his own interpretation upon the action of Congress. A bill was pending providing money for fortifications in the Philippine Islands and certain gentlemen, disapproving of putting any of it at Subic Bay, sought to attach a provision to that bill that no portion of the money carried in that bill should be expended at Subic Bay or Olongapo. That was voted down in the House.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Was it not voted down under such circumstances and conditions as to indicate this House preferred to put money into Subic Bay and establish fortifications there so that our Government might retain Subic Bay permanently when we surrendered the balance of the archipelago? Now, was not that really the effect of that vote?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not at all. We had a large amount of money in the bill for the Philippine Islands and the committee insisted an expenditure was needed at both places, and certain gentlemen thought none should be expended at Subic Bay and tried to put a limitation at that point. There was not a thought in the mind of any human being that none was to be expended at Manila, but some Members thought that none should be expended at Subic Bay.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent, that there is no motion.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I say for one it was my notion and my desire that money be spent for permanent fortifications on Subic Bay and for the protection of Olongapo on that bay to the end that when we got ready to abandon and surrender up the balance of the archipelago we might retain Subic Bay as a permanent naval coaling and commercial station for the benefit of our commerce over there, on the theory that we should not permanently retain Cavite or Manila when we surrendered up the balance of the archipelago. Manila is the largest city in the island; it is the heart of the island of Luzon and Luzon is the heart of the whole archipelago, and therefore we should not abandon the island at all unless we abandon Cavite and Manila. We can not consistently hold Cavite and surrender Manila, because Cavite is within gun range of Manila. It was, I think, the opinion of a majority of this House in the last Congress to surrender Cavite as well as Manila when we conclude to surrender the islands and set them up for themselves.

Mr. BUTLER. The Government has a reservation at Subic Bay.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The Government has a reservation at Subic Bay and I understand we were to expend money at Subic Bay to make permanent improvements there.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to ask if the gentleman does not think this decision of the Army that we can not defend the fortifications of Subic Bay refutes the opinion which the gentleman has and forbids the holding of Subic Bay as a permanent coaling and commercial station, because we can not defend it if we abandon the islands?

Mr. DRISCOLL. If we can not defend Subic Bay we can not defend Manila.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. There is plenty space for armies around Manila and Cavite, just as around Subic Bay, because they are all on the mainland of Luzon.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But the city of Manila is not surrounded by high hills commanding the harbor to the same extent that Subic Bay is. Now, if the gentleman had moved in the last Congress that no part of this money should be spent at Manila and the House had voted for that, then he could well have interpreted the House to mean as the gentleman now claims.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I think if the gentleman will read the RECORD he will find the action of the House indicated just about what I say now, and I think it will bear me out in that assertion.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not the gentleman remember when this matter was debated the plea was made that this dry dock was on the way to the Philippine Islands and that an appropriation should be made so as to have some location when it got there, and the only place where the water was deep enough was in Subic Bay, and they could attach it to the shore in some way, and therefore the appropriation ought to be allowed to be made so as to carry out that part of the project?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I am aware there was some talk of that, but that was not the crux of the question at that time. But the Members of this House were lined up on the question, and really the question on which they were voting was whether Subic Bay should be retained as permanent station when we abandoned the rest of the archipelago or that Cavite should be retained. A very large majority of the Members of this House expressed themselves in favor of the permanent retention of Subic Bay and the abandonment, when the time came, of Cavite and Manila.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the gentleman himself has no way of knowing how each Member voted or why he voted, and I remember that argument was used with a great deal of force, that there was a dry dock on the way there, and there was no place for it unless we could secure an appropriation that might be used to place the dry dock in Subic Bay. I think my colleague ought to surrender with the Navy.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. I do not surrender on that question.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. He has not even begun to fight. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. I hope to live to see the time when we may surrender the islands, and when that time comes I hope to retain an island or a fortification somewhere for a permanent naval station. I do not think we can surrender the balance of the islands and retain Manila, or if we surrender Manila we can not retain Cavite. That would not be right and proper. But I do hope we will retain an island, or part of an island, with a good natural harbor for a naval base, and, in my judgment, Subic Bay and Olongapo are the most available for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for just one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I want to ask the chairman of this committee if the Army and Navy board, in their explorations over there, have found any other island or natural harbor instead of Subic Bay which may be fitted up and improved for a permanent naval station in case we abandon the rest of the islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I know of no such discovery, and there is no proposition to defend such a place, anyhow.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss this question at any length, but I do feel that I can not sit still and allow it to be said here and proclaimed to the country that we will not fortify a great harbor of this world because there is danger that somebody may get in behind it and take it away from us. In other words, I do not believe that the intelligent judgment of the Army officers of the United States is that we should practically abandon Subic Bay because, possibly, some time, there may come at some remote place on the island an army and get in behind and take the bay. There are no great bays in the world that are treated in that way. I have been in the bay or harbor of Habana, I have recently been in the harbor at Santiago, and I have seen many others, and I think they could each and all be easily taken if you would get in behind them with an army. And therefore I think people must have been greatly behind the times when they sought to build Moro Castles and other fortifications or defenses at the mouth of the channel or entrance to the bay or harbor to prevent a navy from getting into them if this judgment of the Army, as stated here, is true. A navy must be successful in taking some harbor or landing place on the island before an army could be landed to take anything.

Subic Bay is located outside of Manila Bay, and the navy has got to get a footing on the island and somewhere before an army can come and take any bay. Dewey, when approaching Manila the night before the 1st day of May, 1898, turned the prows of his vessels into Subic Bay to see whether there were any Spanish ships there. And he would never have gone into the straits leading into Manila Bay and left behind him a Spanish vessel of any consequence. He would have taken it first, for he was a good officer and knew what was required to protect his fleet in his advance into Manila Bay and upon the Spanish war ships.

I believe in protecting Manila by fortifying Subic Bay. If we safely hold it with only a small fleet, a large and formidable fleet will not attempt to take Manila, Cavite, or Manila Bay. To do so would be as fatal as to take a large army past a strong military post of the enemy, leaving its communications and rear open to be assailed. I do not criticise the appropriation made here, because it can be used probably as far as it needs to be used now for the purpose of further strengthening and fortifying Subic Bay, but I rose simply to offer my protest against the claim that we should abandon that place, practically, because somebody might get upon the heights with rifles or something and shoot into the ships below. When they are getting up there we will have somebody, either soldiers, sailors, or marines, crawling up the front and driving them away.

I believe that Subic Bay is the natural key to Manila and that it will always remain so. This bay or harbor, like all others when used for defensive purposes, is not to be occupied to fight naval battles in, as in Lord Nelson's time, but for a safe fleet, large or small, to occupy and to sally forth from. I do not make my claim simply because, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] says, we want some time or other to give away those islands and keep merely a coaling station in Subic Bay. We will not give them away, nor trade them off, as long, I think, as the flag flies.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly. I have no time, but I will yield.

Mr. DRISCOLL. "The gentleman from New York" did not say give them away, but said to set them up for themselves. That was his idea, whether he said that exactly or not.

Mr. KEIFER. That is the same thing; so that is all I desire to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I think in justice to the Taft party, as against the Taft board, something should be said on this question by me, because when this matter was before Congress two years ago I had the pleasure of rallying most of the members of the Taft party in opposition to the projected plan of the Taft board for the defense of Subic Bay. It seems that the Taft board has at last caught up with the nonmilitary experts who went out as members of the Taft party; and yet those of the party who were not in harmony with the movement made in the House at that time to prevent the expenditure of money at Subic Bay need not be disheartened. Under date of February 1, 1906, the Taft board addressed a communication to the Secretary of War, in which they make this statement:

> Guantanamo is a strategic base absolutely necessary for the control of the Caribbean Sea and the subsequent control of the route to the canal at Colon. Subic Bay occupies the same relation in relation to the control of the Philippines, and its protection by fixed defenses is of gravest importance, not only in order that a fleet may protect Manila, but that it may have facilities for docking, repairing, and provisioning in those distant waters.

At this session of Congress information has been communicated that Subic Bay will practically be abandoned for the purposes intended. It is unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, that this light did not penetrate the minds of the military experts just a little earlier, because the projected defenses for Subic Bay contemplated two 10-inch, four 6-inch, and eight 3-inch guns; and remarkable as it may appear, the experts did not make up their minds that it would be inadvisable to defend Subic Bay until after Congress had authorized all the guns contemplated to be erected there. After having given all the guns asked to defend the place, they now tell us it is unnecessary to do anything there, and they propose to abandon it. This illustrates some of the difficulties that members of the Committee on Appropriations have in dealing with these questions. I congratulate the committee that so far the Department has not succeeded in getting very much for Guantanamo, which has been pictured as equally important from a strategic standpoint as was Subic Bay.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is appropriate at this time to refer to another matter of very grave importance. There has been a great deal of discussion in the public press as to the action of the committee in not appropriating as much money as the Department asked for fortification purposes. One item submitted was of $925,000 to build a sea wall around some fortifications. That matter was before the committee for two years, and all of the time there was serious litigation pending as to the title of the property. Now it has been practically determined that the United States has not the title, and yet that information was carefully withheld from the committee all the time the request was pending that the money be appropriated.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What reason have you for saying the committee knew?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee did not know. The Department knew it. The Government was engaged in litigation; it had been notified before a dollar was expended, and yet the Department was earnestly pressing the committee to make the appropriation, but never breathed or intimated that there was the slightest question in regard to the title of the property.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for five minutes additional.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The gentleman does not mean to intimate that the Department would have spent $900,000 on property which was in litigation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I do intimate that; and I say that there is no doubt that it would have done so, because it erected the guns themselves, with their emplacements, on the land when the title was in question and litigation was pending; and they were asking for the money to build this wall without giving the committee the slightest intimation of the situation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does not the gentleman distinguish between putting personal property on somebody else's land and improving the real estate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, we have no right——

Mr. DOUGLAS. You can take the guns and carriages away but you can not take away the sea wall.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You can not take away the emplacements, which are the most expensive part of these fortifications. They could not very easily be removed except by the use of some very high explosive.

Mr. DOUGLAS. They could by the use of a derrick.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; you can not take the great cement foundations out on which these guns are placed.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] yesterday called attention to this article in a magazine for March named "Government," in which a Member of this House pointed out certain facts, or alleged facts, about the defenses of Puget Sound.

I will insert in the RECORD this paragraph of his statement:

And what of our fortifications? In a recent purported interview with one of our Army officers, he is quoted as saying that San Francisco was practically impregnable and that the mouth of the Columbia River and Puget Sound were well fortified. Of the fortifications at San Francisco and the mouth of the Columbia River, personally I know nothing. As the chain of our defenses, like any other chain, is little stronger than its weakest link, I shall therefore be content to speak only of the fortifications of Puget Sound. I visited these fortifications a few days ago. The entrance to Puget Sound is guarded by three forts: Flagler, Casey, and Worden. The channel they guard, at its narrowest place, is 3½ miles wide. Its average width is more than 4 miles. According to the statements of all the officers, the 14-inch gun is required at each of the forts to be effective against a modern battle ship. There is not a gun of this caliber at any of them. The largest guns are two 12-inch at Worden and two of the same caliber at Flagler, while the heaviest at Fort Casey are only 10-inch. Of the 12-inch guns, only one at Fort Worden is mounted on a modern carriage; and of the two at Fort Flagler, one is mounted on an old carriage, discarded some years ago as worthless at Sandy Hook, from which it can not be fired, and the other one is lying on the grass. It was mounted on another of the old discarded Sandy Hook carriages, and the first time it was discharged it destroyed the carriage and crippled for life one of the soldiers. It is charged, and there is considerable material evidence to be seen by anyone who visits the forts to sustain the assertion, that these forts have largely been made the dumping ground of old and discarded equipment of forts on the Atlantic. There are mortar batteries at each of these forts that at certain ranges would be very effective if they were properly manned, provided an enemy would be so accommodating as to appear when there was neither smoke nor fog. According to a recent report by one of the Army officers, in order to make these forts even approach complete equipment, three 14-inch guns should be added at Fort Casey, and the 10-inch guns at Fort Worden should be replaced by those of 12-inch caliber. But even as they are equipped to-day, if you would take the cooks and waiters and all other men on detail duty and all the sick in the hospitals there would not be at either one of these three forts one-third enough men to handle the guns already installed.

In this statement it appears that there are no 14-inch guns erected for the defense of Puget Sound, and statements are made, based upon some assertions of some officials, that these guns are absolutely essential for the defense of Puget Sound, and a frightful picture is drawn of the helpless condition of Puget Sound. There are only three 14-inch guns of the character intended to be erected at this place building or attempted to be built by the Government, and two of them are intended for Manila. There are none erected at any of the places in the United States that are fortified now. And more than that, so that no one may be too badly frightened when this article is read, I wish to state that the projected defenses for Puget Sound contemplated seven 14-inch guns, six 12-inch, eighteen 10-inch, three 8-inch, twenty-seven 6-inch, eight 5-inch, twenty-four 3-inch guns, and forty-eight 12-inch mortars. None of the 14-inch guns have been placed there, because they have not yet been built for any place in the United States. Until within a year or so they were in a purely experimental stage. Of the six 12-inch guns asked, Congress has authorized four; of the eighteen 10-inch guns, Congress has authorized the entire eighteen; of the three 8-inch guns, Congress has authorized the three; of the twenty-seven 6-inch guns, Congress has authorized twenty; of the eight 5-inch guns, Congress has authorized eight; of the twenty-four 3-inch guns, Congress has authorized twenty, and of the forty-eight 12-inch mortars, Congress has authorized forty.

Mr. SHERLEY. Prior to this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Prior to this bill; and in this bill additional money is provided for the defense of this place. Anybody with any knowledge of the facts must be convinced that Congress has done its full duty in attempting to place this point on the Pacific coast in a proper condition.

There has been some complaint that the carriages upon which some of the guns have been erected are not as efficient, not as modern, as the most improved types in existence, and that is true; but the Chief of Ordnance has stated to the committee that he would not mount these guns on the modern disappearing carriages and take away the old barbette carriages, because the increased cost for carriages and the changes in emplacement would not justify it, in his judgment; that while these carriages did not afford as much protection to the men handling the guns and did not secure as rapid fire as the most modern forms of emplacement, yet they were very satisfactory. This article states that these barbette carriages were discarded carriages from the Sandy Hook proving ground. Mr. Chairman, that is not correct.

These were carriages of an earlier type than those now being built. They were modified to some extent. They were reconstructed and fitted to these guns. It is true that when one of the guns was fired the carriage was wrecked and somebody was injured; and yet the Chief of Ordnance says that they have improved the plans of remodeling, and, in his judgment, the carriages can be utilized, and upon that statement it is hardly to be expected that Congress would entirely discard material that, while not of the most modern type, is yet very serviceable, and put in the modern type instead of attempting to provide for places for which no provision has been made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman permit me to attempt to direct his attention back to Subic Bay for a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will put into the RECORD the statement made by the Taft board as to the records made during the target practice in the years 1904 and 1905 with 8, 10, and 12 inch guns; those mounted upon barbette carriages similar to those against which complaint is made, and the records made with the disappearing carriages. Just to illustrate, four rounds were fired by the 12-inch gun mounted on a disappearing carriage in two minutes and thirteen seconds, while the 12-inch gun mounted on the barbette carriage fired four rounds in four minutes and forty-five seconds. Members of the committee will see that these carriages are very useful, and not so obsolete that they should be abandoned at once.

Caliber of gun.	Time for 4 rounds.
	Min. sec.
8-inch disappearing	1 30
8-inch barbette	3 30
10-inch disappearing	1 25
10-inch barbette	4 44
12-inch disappearing	2 13
12-inch barbette	4 45

Mr. DOUGLAS. Before the gentleman leaves the Puget Sound matter, as he seems to be full of information on the subject, what has he to say about that part of the article which claims that with even what ordnance there is there now, if all of the soldiers and all of the hospital stewards and all of the cooks and everybody else, male and female, in connection with the force at that point would unite, they could not man half the guns they have got?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true of every place in the United States where there are seacoast fortifications. If all the men in defenses at the entrance of New York Harbor and all of the militia trained in the handling of heavy artillery were put to these guns, there would be still an insufficient number of trained men to handle them. But that has nothing to do with this committee. The Committee on Military Affairs has full jurisdiction of the personnel. It is a notorious fact that we have provided implements of defense far in advance of trained men to man them. So that criticism, if it can be leveled at Congress, does not apply particularly to one point, but to the position generally.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman a question which the gentleman from Iowa was not able to answer: How much money has been expended by the United States Government in Subic Bay prior to the recent discovery by the War Department that our position there is not tenable?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not believe anybody lives that can answer that question.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say that I undertook to have that question answered by some of the officers that appeared before our committee at the hearings, but, unfortunately, the expenditures are so divided between the Ordnance Department and the Engineer Department and the Signal Service Corps that no man was able to give us the information. There are no data now in the possession of the committee that would enable us to accurately answer the question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman say whether they got any information in conflict with the fact that the money expended at Subic Bay for fortifications is in no wise lost or the value lessened by the change of base to Manila?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is fair to say that the officers of the Army claim that the guns mounted at Subic Bay are still necessary, notwithstanding the abandonment of Subic Bay as a naval base.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman state when the recent discovery by the War Department was made that Subic Bay could not defended?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not the information.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman from Nebraska misunderstands the situation. A number of the members of the board were opposed to Subic Bay on the ground that it was impracticable to defend it. A minority of the Army board agreed with the naval board in locating the naval station at Subic Bay. It was not a change of the opinion of all the Army officers; it was simply a change of enough to make a majority of the board from one side to the other.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was not a change of all the naval officers either, because some distinguished naval officers always opposed the decision to fortify Subic Bay.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether it is not a fact that during the past year, some time in the fall of the year, the discovery was definitely made and a report made to the President that the former recommendations were mistaken, and that recent surveys had demonstrated that the military authorities had been in error, and thereupon it was decided to abandon the former policy of defending Subic Bay.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I shall take the time to address the committee upon this point after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from New York, whom I do not care to further interrupt now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has been suggested, I will state to the gentleman from Nebraska—and this is not original with me—it has been suggested that this radical change of policy sprung from the War Department somewhat as Minerva sprung from the brow of Jove. From the care with which I have examined the matter, it seems to me that there is much foundation for that suggestion. [Laughter.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But I want to say to the gentleman that Minerva sprung fully armed and equipped from the brow of Jove, and in this case the armament seems to be lacking. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken; all the armament that was intended for Subic Bay is there now, so that the modern Minerva did spring forth fully armed and panoplied.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the gentleman intimate that the appropriations were secured for one purpose and are now to be used for another?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, the gentleman must do his own intimating. I did not mean to say that. I do mean to say this, that we did have the spectacle of a serious dispute between various arms of the service as to whether the main base of fortification should be Subic Bay or Manila and that subsequently one of the arms retreated from that fight, and that is the reason why the committee has been slow in making appropriations for projects that we did not feel were certainly fixed and settled in the mind of the Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman asked one question which is pertinent. He asked how much money had been expended before this change was determined upon. I endeavored to figure that out, and I have had some success, without any great compliment to myself, in unearthing matters of this kind and getting at somewhat accurate results.

I gave this task up as absolutely hopeless. I endeavored two years ago to ascertain not only how much the Navy Department had expended, but how much it contemplated expending, and I gave that up after I found that the estimate originally made for a naval station at Subic Bay reached the astounding figure of $80,000,000. Admiral Dewey told the Naval Committee that he had stated to Admiral Taylor that if he ever disclosed that fact to the Naval Committee it would startle and frighten them. What was in contemplation of these officers when this thing was first suggested—remember the $80,000,000 was the estimate based upon a plan that they had—or what they have actually expended it is equally impossible to tell.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this that I may have an opportunity of recalling to the attention of gentlemen who have been in this House several years the action of Congress upon the subject that we are discussing. The Navy does not propose to leave Subic Bay, if I recollect correctly the judgment of naval officers. After we found ourselves in a land that we knew nothing of, the officials of the Navy drifted about it to find some place where the water was deep enough to enable this Government to maintain a navy-yard. For three or four years they seemed undecided, but after thorough examination of both Subic Bay and Manila they finally determined that they could not possibly make a convenient navy-yard at Cavite or at Manila without a great expenditure of money, and that the navy-yard must go to Subic Bay. It was not contemplated at that time, neither is it contemplated now, to build a great naval station at Olongapo.

I do hope the membership of this House will exercise its sensible judgment, as it has done heretofore, and prevent any attempt to remove the naval station from Subic Bay to Manila or Cavite, where the same conditions prevail now as were found when the Congress reached its conclusion. One of the inducing causes was an insufficiency of water. I have had one or two experiences in assisting to establish naval stations where the water was shallow, and in one case where the Government discovered it did not own the land in front of its dock. As the future concerns me I shall not again make a mistake if I can rely on my own judgment, made up from the opinions of competent officials who do know and who have the courage to speak. At Subic Bay there is between 90 and 100 feet of water. This great dock that was built on the Atlantic and floated to Manila was intended to stop and stay at Olongapo, on Subic Bay; but this House was never asked to make an appropriation for a station at this point, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has said, because there was a dry dock already on the road. Congress has settled the location of this navy-yard, and it was at the place I have indicated, where the Government has a reservation of many acres of land.

It is never contemplated that a battle between this country and any other country will occur in Subic Bay. There is no place to fight within those shores. Admiral Dewey has said that when he left Hongkong on orders from this Government he looked in at Subic Bay to see whether or not the Spanish fleet had sought shelter there. We are not a foolish people. It is not intended that our fleet should lie in Subic Bay when its enemy approaches. It will be the duty of our fleet to go out on the sea to make the engagement. One reason why this Congress has made appropriations for swift ships follows the argument that they are intended to lie in front of Subic Bay and warn our fleet of the approach of its enemy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, though I am somewhat of a layman on this subject, still from my meager knowledge I thought the purpose of a naval base was to serve as a protection to the fleet in time of war from attack; that the strength of Gibraltar and other naval bases that England is building lies in the fact that they are secure from attaek by land. I would like the gentleman to give his views upon that question.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I am not a military expert. I do know, however, that we maintain naval stations in this country without one bit of land defense. I wish I did possess sufficient knowledge to answer my friend's question accurately and intelligently. I understand from the people whose understanding is better than my own that in these days fleets do not fight under cover. These great ships that weigh 16,000 and 20,000 tons are built to fight at sea, and when we sought this bottle-shaped harbor it was not to find a convenient battlefield—it was for station purposes alone. The natural conditions furnished the reason for the occupation. It was never intended that we should fight therein or remain on the ground except for shelter and repair. Furthermore, we go there because we want the protection that the hills afford. The country is not in danger of attack, in my judgment, but nature attacks every portion of it in the visitation of terrific storms. High winds blow. Naval experts inform us that they could not in safety anchor this floating dry dock in Manila Bay on account of these high winds that come periodically with the rising of the sun and which do not abate with its going down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM. I ask unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. The authorities determined the attending danger in an attempt to dock a ship in a floating dock in Manila Bay because of the frightful force of these sweeping winds, and I believe no sailor with a judgment worth accepting on the subject would venture to make it. This subject is not new. This discussion has lasted since Dewey went to Manila. The dispute was settled in favor of Olongapo, this place offering the best facilities, depth of water, and shelter from the tropical winds.

Mr. DRISCOLL. How many feet of water does this dry dock which was sent over there require?

Mr. BUTLER. Between 50 and 55 feet, and if the gentleman from New York will take this map, I will show that it——

Mr. DRISCOLL. Then it can not go anywhere near the dock at Cavite?

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman say there is not 50 feet in the bay?

Mr. BUTLER. Not anywhere near the shore.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nor near the dock at Cavite?

Mr. BUTLER. The water is between 20 and 30 feet near the dock—ascertained by the Government by a survey.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that when you wish to put a dock there there is only 20 or 30 feet of water, but when you wish to build an island there is a hundred feet of water.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I never was at Cavite, and I never measured a foot of water, and I do not propose to make any guess. I speak by the records. There is now a little naval station—once maintained by the Spaniards—at Cavite, and I see by this valuable map prepared by the Government that in front of the station a patent slip has been built enabling the docking of a ship of 2,500 tons.

We all know very well that there is no accommodation for our ships of war at Cavite or Manila, and within the line that is marked as the northern limit of reserve naval anchorage the water does not exceed 30 feet at any point, while varying in depth. Here is found a shifting sandy bottom, which the hand of the dredger can easily impress, his work to be lost when his hand is removed. There is no necessity for a land defense at Subic Bay. Beyond the advantage of climate it is not a good place to live. How much do you suppose the palace cost in which the general of the Army lives at Manila? It is worth your while to make the inquiry. How much do you suppose the magnificent barracks quarters cost in which the Army lives in Manila? Do not ask me; go to higher authority and be surprised and better informed.

Olongapo offers no comfort which society furnishes, but our Government, that pays men well for their services, has a right to command them to live where the Government sees fit. The climate at Subic Bay is fine, comparing it with that found at Manila. This condition was considered along with the others when the conclusion was reached. Nature has afforded a protection there that man could not give. The high hills break the force of the typhoon, and the temperature shows a difference of from 10 to 15 degrees lower than Manila, thus making it a comfortable tropical place in which to live. But there is no society, for which all men yearn, to be found there. If this nation concludes that our naval station is to remain indefinitely at Olongapo, then let us prepare the place for the reception of society. Let the family follow the soldier.

I do not know what this House will do, but for myself alone I speak. I will never vote to remove that naval station from Subic Bay. I had my doubts about the desirability until the President of the United States and two Secretaries of the Navy convinced me. The adoption of this place was that of every branch of the Government. The question of land defense was considered. Admiral Dewey was asked the question whether it was necessary to fortify Subic Bay on the land side, and he said that a hostile army would not land until the fleet had been reduced.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield? Has the President and the two Secretaries deserted the gentleman now?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is exactly the question I desired to ask.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not feel lonely, I do not care who deserts me so long as my family "stands to." [Applause.] I do not run to the White House or to the Navy Department for all the information I now have or may hereafter need. I do not know whether I have been deserted by those who convinced me or not, but if they have I am still for Subic Bay. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, before the Naval Affairs Committee reported the first appropriation bill carrying an item for a station in the Philippine Islands, we made a diligent inquiry covering a space of a year.

The question of land defense was considered and the judgment of the experts was pronounced upon it. No commander who is entitled to command, and no master of men who expects to maintain his mastery, would dare to land a force upon the Philippine Islands until he had first taken the sea. Invade for what purpose? To surround an empty basin? There is nothing there to destroy but a dry dock and a magazine.

Every estimate that is made to the Committee on Naval Affairs contains items for fast ships to use as scouts, as guides, as guards, and as sentinels to watch over the sea and notify our fleets of the approach of the invader. The Admiral of the Navy, who is wise and has had much experience and understands the needs of the service well, has always stood by Subic Bay for the naval station. He has explained the manner of attack that would be made should our possession of the islands be disputed. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is right. The naval experts agree Subic Bay is the key to the defense of Manila. Conditions remain unaltered. Why should the judgment of men shift? The hills have neither shaken nor lowered, and the number has not been reduced. Waters have neither shoaled nor deepened. Manila is 60 miles from Subic Bay, no farther, no less a distance than at that time when the adoption was made.

To repeat, in the event of an attack upon Manila the key is Subic Bay. Opportunities will be given to our fleet to strike an enemy in the rear, and for this reason the wise men, the military men, agree that no attempt will be made to land a force at Manila or elsewhere until our fleet is first destroyed. I am going to vote for this appropriation to fortify Manila because I believe it is a duty imposed upon me to do so. I voted, along with other Members of this House, for the appropriation that brought us these islands, and I feel upon my shoulders an inconspicuous but an humble duty of doing everything that is necessary to be done to make these people safe in their homes and to protect them from foreign attack, if such attack should be made upon them. But there is no military reason, in my judgment, for more than sea fortifications at Subic Bay.

Why would an enemy go into Subic Bay if he had destroyed the fleet on the outside? What would be his purpose in going into Subic Bay from the rear if the fleets were destroyed? What necessity for land defense in that event? The Spaniards gained nothing by the occupation of Santiago Bay, except the privilege of coming out to do battle. That was a mistake without fear of repetition. Dewey has said that when he sailed to Manila he looked ino the mouth of Subic Bay to see whether the enemy was there. If it had been, I suppose he would have bottled it up and passed along. Americans are not likely to suffer from the danger of the bottling process in view of the sea fortifications now being erected.

Mr. Chairman, when the naval appropriation bill is before the House for consideration we will renew this argument with the hope that we may all be profited thereby. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish the question propounded to my friend from Pennsylvania to intimate in any way that I am opposed to the retention of a naval base in Subic Bay. From my little reading on the subject I recognize that if a naval base adjacent to foreign territory or liable to invasion is to be impregnable, it must be first free from attack, or as free as possible from attack, by land. I hardly can agree with the gentleman in his parallel case that there are many instances of naval bases in this country that are not protected from land attack, because there are entirely different conditions existing on land here, with no likelihood of land attack, from the conditions that may prevail in the Philippines. It is easy enough for us to conceive of some enemy landing a large force and placing their artillery in such a position that no naval vessel would be able to seek the naval base for repairs, or more, as I consider a naval base, in need in time of war for coaling purposes.

I conceive that these naval bases will be sought by our naval vessels for replenishing their coal when in need. I quite agree with the gentleman, and it is not necessary to speak on that subject, that it is the purpose of war vessels to go and seek the enemy and to attack, rather than to wait to be attacked. As a very leading military expert said to me only recently, the Lieutenant-General of the Army, "That that army is best and that navy is best that can attack the quickest and is best prepared for action, and that it is the duty always to begin the attack, if in fighting trim, at the earliest possible moment, and not to delay to permit your enemy to meet your onslaught."

Now, I should like, as the chairman of the committee is going to follow, to have him state to the House, because I have not that information, and I believe the information would be interesting to the Members of the House, as to whether Manila Bay is more impregnable from attack than Subic Bay, and whether it is because of that fact that further fortifications of Subic Bay have been abandoned.

Mr. DRISCOLL. From which side, the front or the rear?

Mr. STAFFORD. From the land side. Because, as I understand the proposition, the reason why the military officials object to Subic Bay is only because it is liable to attack from land and not from attack by sea.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this discussion has long proceeded with practically no motion before the committee. I will therefore try to answer some of these inquiries that have been put and after doing so ask that we proceed with the reading of the bill.

It is true that Subic Bay has greater depth of water near the shore than Manila Bay. It is true that in Manila Bay there is much of very deep water, but it would require a great deal of dredging in order to make a suitable location for a dry dock and navy-yard there. It is also true that the formation is such that the dredging would probably have to be constant in the future. Now, you can see that Subic Bay with its vast depth of water, requiring but little dredging, and that probably permanent, would have advantages over Manila Bay which requires a large amount of dredging and will constantly require work to maintain it.

The joint board was to determine which was the better place, and, no doubt influenced by those matters to which I have just called attention, it, by a majority vote, composed chiefly of the naval officers, determined in favor of Subic Bay. But that question was never settled. There was always a minority in favor of Manila Bay, that minority being composed chiefly of Army officers, who relied upon the fact that Subic Bay is surrounded by high hills very difficult to defend against a land attack.

Now, in the course of these years the majority has finally shifted from one side to the other. There has been no discovery; there has been no revelation; but in this difference between scientific men on a subject, weighing all the advantages of both places, the majority has finally shifted to Manila for the present time. Whether it will remain there or not no one can tell. Subic Bay has a narrow entrance and is easier defended from the sea than Manila Bay. There is a 3-mile-wide entrance to Subic Bay, but only 2 miles of it is navigable. There is an 8-mile-wide entrance to Manila Bay. You can see how these matters were balanced one against the other.

Thus friends of Subic Bay relied on the narrow entrance and deep water. Those of Manila relied upon the fact that the topography of the country was such as to be easily defended against a land attack. It is not to be wondered at that in a lapse of ten years, with the question always close, that a portion of the board finally has changed and at the present decided different from what it decided eight or ten years ago.

But now what has that to do with the matter under consideration and inquiry? We have been making appropriations for the Philippines for fortifications generally, leaving it to the Department, as we have always left it, for the defense of the United States, to determine where the emplacements should be. Out of this volume of appropriations certain guns have been placed on Grande Island, in the entrance to Subic Bay.

I grant you that not much of defense of Subic Bay will be needed if there is to be no navy-yard there at all. Of course, the fact that we make a naval station does not determine how extensive it is to be—whether it is to be a great naval station, or whether it is to be practically a coaling station, or whether it is to be made a repair station. It may be an elaborate naval base; it may be a very inferior one.

Now, the Taft board had a great plan for the fortification of Subic Bay, based upon the assumption that it was to become one of the great naval stations of the United States. They had planned for four 12-inch guns, three 10-inch guns, four 6-inch guns, twelve 3-inch guns, and eight mortars for the protection of this entrance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this plan is that of the Army?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I say that it was a provision made by the Taft board for the fortification of the entrance of Subic Bay. Now, no such provision had been made. The allotments that have been made, while I have not been able to give them to the committee this morning in dollars, were sufficient to erect four 6-inch guns, two 10-inch guns, and eight 3-inch guns at the entrance of Subic Bay. At the moment the balance turned against Subic Bay in this joint board all further thought of fortification at this point was abandoned, and will remain abandoned unless the Congress ultimately establishes a great naval base at Subic Bay; nothing will be erected at all——

Mr. DRISCOLL. May not the board shift again?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It makes no difference how the board shifts, it can not locate a naval station at Subic Bay without Congress appropriates the money for that purpose, and so no fortifications are in contemplation or will be erected at Subic Bay not already in course of construction unless Congress provides for a naval station of magnitude within the bay.

Now, it is said here that this money has been wasted. That is not so. We have quite a large amount of property in Subic Bay now. We have this dry dock there; but it is said in time of war our fleet would go out. What fleet have we at Subic Bay now to go out?

Mr. BUTLER. No; but we will have it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not for quite a long while.

Mr. BUTLER. It will be there in about four months.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It has been quite a long while since we have had one there, and it will be quite a long while before we have one there again for any length of time.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman know that one of the finest arsenals this country owns is at Subic Bay?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am aware that quite a considerable portion of the work has been done in installing the navy-yard at Subic Bay, and I am pointing out that what we have put into fortifications at Subic Bay has been wisely put there, every dollar's worth of it.

Mr. BUTLER. That is right.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. We have had no navy to defend the entrance to Subic Bay; and if we had had a war come suddenly upon us, it would have been entirely possible for a foreign power to enter Subic Bay with its fleet, or a portion of it, and destroy this dock and this arsenal that the gentleman refers to. And so moderate protection ought to exist there now in any event. That is all that has been provided, and all that it is contemplated to provide, and there is not a cent in this bill for Subic Bay, and this whole question has come up as a collateral one that really is not before the House for consideration at this time. I ask that the reading of the bill proceed.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For installation of electric plants at the defenses of the following localities:

In the Hawaiian Islands, $20,000;

In the Philippine Islands, $115,000.

In all, $135,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am sorry to occupy the time of the committee further, but I should like to get a little information from the gentleman in charge of the bill. This bill, as I understand, appropriates for fortifications about $8,000,000 altogether.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is correct.

Mr. PERKINS. What proportion of that is expended in various ways and shapes on the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In round numbers, about $2,000,000.

Mr. PERKINS. About one-quarter of the entire expense of the Government for fortifications is spent in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. For this one year.

Mr. PERKINS. Has not that been the case, to some extent, for many years?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, no.

Mr. PERKINS. What proportion was spent last year?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. My recollection is that the total amount for the insular possessions last year was $1,600,000.

Mr. PERKINS. And what was the total amount for the United States, in all its fortifications?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. About $6,000,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Then it was about one-fourth last year.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. You asked me about the Philippines in the first instance, and now you are asking me about the insular possessions, a different thing.

Mr. PERKINS. The bulk of the money spent in the insular possessions goes to the Philippines, does it not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. The larger proportion.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not last year.

Mr. PERKINS. Where did it go last year?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. To the Hawaiian Islands, and the previous year, too, I may say.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman is familiar with the subject. What proportion of the expenditures, not only for fortifications, but for an enlarged army and an enlarged navy, does the gentleman say is due, directly and indirectly, to the supposed necessity of guarding against all enemies the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, I am not capable of giving the gentleman an answer at this time as to what the increased expense of the Army and Navy and the Marine Corps, and so forth, would be because of our ownership of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman think that an increase from 20 per cent to 25 per cent in our military expenses during the last seven or eight years has been due, and necessitated in various ways, to the fact that we are in the Philippine Islands, as the gentleman from Ohio says, so long as the flag shall wave?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think 25 per cent of the expense of the Army has been for the Philippine Islands.

Mr. PERKINS. And of the Navy expenses in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not think that there has been any increase of the naval expenses to amount to anything on account of the Philippine Islands, except for construction of the naval base at Subic Bay.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, we must have had additional ships on that account.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not think the Navy has grown any faster than it would have if we had not had the Philippine Islands.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does not coal and other supplies cost more there?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Some of our ships would be over there in that part of the world if we didn't own the Philippines. As I understand it, Dewey's fleet was in the Orient when we did not have the Philippine Islands.

Mr. PERKINS. But a very much smaller fleet than we have now.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; but we had a larger fleet in the Orient than we have there now.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman one more question, because he has studied economic questions. I would like to ask him to what he attributes the large increase in the expenses of the Navy unless to a considerable degree it is due to our insular possessions?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think I am the least of all qualified to answer that question, as I have usually voted for the smallest number of battle ships proposed.

Mr. PERKINS. I have had the pleasure of joining with the gentleman from Iowa in that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. My judgment is that the increase in the Navy is due to the changed spirit of the people and their desire to dominate upon the seas.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a word suggested by the answers of my friend, the gentleman from Iowa, although my remarks are not pertinent to anything now under consideration. The gentleman in charge of the bill, who has given much study to the question of appropriations, states before the House, and in that I think we all agree with him, that to the extent of 25 per cent the increase in our Army expenses during the last seven or eight years has been due to the fact that we are in possession of the Philippines. It appears here that in reference to the fortifications this year, for instance, and to some extent last year, nearly one quarter of the money spent is spent on the Philippine Islands. While the gentleman does not wholly agree with me, I feel confident myself that of the various causes that have concurred to make the great increase in our naval forces and naval expenditure 25 per cent can fairly be accredited and charged to the Philippines.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman point out any items in this bill relating to the Philippines providing for the building of fortifications there that would not be provided for if we were simply retaining a naval base in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from New York may be entirely right in that. I was not especially criticising the form of this appropriation.

Mr. DRISCOLL. We would not want Cavite or Manila Harbor; we would simply have Olongapo and Subic Bay.

Mr. PERKINS. Apart from that, Mr. Chairman, it is deserving of consideration, because this is a question that looms up largely before us, that we may fairly attribute of the more than $200,000,000 spent on the Army and Navy and coast defense and fortifications an increase of from 20 to 25 per cent, which would not exist if to-day we were not so fortunate or unfortunate as to be in possession of those islands.

At this very session appropriations are asked, for instance, for the purchase of the Appalachian and White Mountains reserves. I am not here either to defend them or to attack them, but there is no possible doubt, Mr. Chairman, that the question of preserving the water supply of the United States, in view of the rapid diminution of the coal supply, is one of the great questions of the future.

No such question can be considered, it is said, because we have not the money. There are proposals for the development of our internal waterways, much advocated by our friends from Pennsylvania. I am not here to say that those are wise or unwise; but the problem of the future development of waterways, the extension of canals, is one of the great problems of the future, and one of infinite importance in increasing the industrial wealth and development of this land. No one can question that the development of the waterways is just as important in the development of the industrial wealth of the country as has been the growth of the railways. All of those things are stopped because we have not sufficient money. Certainly, I think, it is a problem for all Members of this House to consider, when the increase in our military expenses, due to these possessions, is forty or fifty million dollars a year, when that sum, spread over a period of only ten or twenty years—not so long as the flag flies, as was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio—would furnish this Government with more money than is needed to develop a system of internal waterways, and to develop systems by which the water supply of this country and its river sources may be preserved—to develop systems the importance of which in the industrial growth of this country in the future no man can estimate.

It is something for us to think about, if in place of spending the money required for these military matters, we could have a sum more than ample for the largest requirements made by those interested in internal developments. Year by year we are expending vast sums for the increase of the military and naval establishments supposed to be required for the preservation and the perpetual holding of the Philippine Islands. It certainly is a question for the people of this country as to which way that money could most profitably be expended for the national good and greatness. [Applause.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of asking a question, since this seems to be a catechising session. We have been receiving from prominent people petitions against the expenditure of $60,000,000 for battle ships, cruisers, etc. One set was signed by prominent clergymen in New York City. This one here which I have is signed by Andrew Carnegie and a lot of distinguished business men in New York City. The following statement is set forth in all of these petitions:

Sixty-five per cent of the national income is now expended on war, past and present.

I would like to ask the chairman of this committee, who seems to be interested in affairs of war, or the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, if that allegation is correct? The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a year ago said that we are expending 57 per cent, if I recollect, of our total expenditures for wars which we have had and wars which we are looking for.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] will pardon me, I will correct him. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations two years ago made the statement that we were that year expending 63⅝ per cent of our aggregate revenue on account of wars that we have had and wars that we are preparing for. I think that it is a conservative statement to say that for the objects which I then enumerated much in detail we are this year expending at least 65 per cent of the aggregate revenue of the Government on account of the Army and Navy, including expenditures on account of wars we have had in the past; and if all these expenditures increase in the next three years as they have in the last three years and our revenues continue to diminish, it will not be two years before we will be spending 70 per cent of our aggregate revenue on account of wars that we have had and wars we are preparing for which we anticipate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would like to ask the gentleman what proportion of that 63⅝ per cent is expended on wars we have had, to wit, pensions, and what part on wars we expect?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not give the gentleman the exact figures, but for the fiscal year 1907 our expenditures on account of pensions were 22 per cent of our aggregate revenue. That, however, does not include the entire expenditure on account of wars we have heretofore had.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to suggest that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] called attention to a matter here that could readily be misunderstood. We annexed certain new territory that was unfortified at a time when for many years we had been fortifying continental United States. With continental United States fairly well fortified and with this new territory unfortified it is not surprising that for a few years a large percentage of the money expended for that purpose should be expended in the new territory. He asked me how much of the bill this year was for the insular possessions or the Philippines, and how much last year, but he failed to ask me what percentage of the money expended for fortifications since the inauguration of the modern fortification scheme had been expended in the insular possessions and what portion in continental United States.

But I wish to state, although not asked the question, as nearly as I can compute it at this time, when this bill has passed about 3 per cent of the money appropriated for fortifications will have been appropriated for the insular possessions and about 97 per cent for continental United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all material purchased under the foregoing provisions of this act shall be of American manufacture, except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases in limited quantities abroad, which material shall be admitted free of duty, as shall other similar material furnished without charge.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SHERLEY. I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment. I move to strike out the words "in limited quantities" in the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 13, page 4, strike out the words "in limited quantities."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, this provision at the close of the fortification bill properly instructs the Department to purchase material of American manufacture. It also provides, however, that in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases in limited quantities abroad they may be so made. My motion is to strike out the words "in limited quantities." Now, I am in entire accord with the position of the Department and of the majority Members of the House that a different rule should pertain to the purchase of articles used in the way of ordnance and fortifications from what might apply to other purchases to be made by the Government. In other words, it is manifest that we should endeavor to have the Government self-sustaining and the country self-sustaining so far as needs may be for ordnance or for fortifications.

In every instance preference should be given to American manufacturers, but I believe that giving to the Secretary of War the power to buy, not in limited quantities, but in unlimited quantities when necessary in order to protect the Government from extortion, would be a proper rule. And I can not understand how the gentlemen of the majority can object to giving to the Secretary of War, particularly to the present Secretary of War, the power to buy abroad when, in his judgment, it is necessary for the best interests of the country and of the Army. They need have no fear that that Secretary will abuse the discretion, but it may be that a time will arise when, in the judgment of the Department, such power ought to be possessed. Now, it may be answered that no request for this change in law has occurred. That is true, but the absence of a request indicates nothing. It is manifest that no officer of the War Department is going to suggest such a change, suggestive, as it is, of opposition to one of the fundamental principles of the party in power, that we should buy at home, no matter how extortionate the price we pay.

I have made this motion not with the idea of convincing the majority of the error of their way—I am afraid they are too deeply wedded to their sins—but because I believe it is a proper motion, and I should be derelict in my duty to the House and to the country if I did not at least make an attempt to give to the War Department power to protect itself from extortion and to buy its munitions of war abroad when it was necessary. I have enough faith in the patriotism of any Secretary of War; I have enough respect for the patriotism of the present Republican Secretary of War to believe that in every instance he will give a proper preference to ordnance of American manufacture and other material needed, and I also have enough belief in the patriotism of the present Secretary of War to believe that he would take advantage of this change in the law in order to prevent extortion, as he has several times suggested he would like to have the power in regard to supplies for the Isthmian Canal. So I make this motion, believing that it is to the interest of the country and of the War Department. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, just a moment, following along the same line of thought of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that Secretary Taft previous to the resolution passed by Congress prohibiting him from so doing, did buy a large amount of supplies in foreign markets to be used in the Zone, and possibly in the Philippine Islands, and he so reported to Congress, and the matter was discussed here in the last Congress. Now, there was no law to prohibit him from doing that, and he showed wisdom, he showed a full sense of duty, good judgment, and good business sense in doing that very thing. I remember, in a general way, he said he bought many supplies in Australia for the army and our officers in the Philippine Islands, and he bought many things in other foreign markets—I think some ships, supplies, and pieces of machinery to start and continue up to that time the work in the Canal Zone.

Now, then, gentlemen, the Department of Justice and the Bureau of Corporations and the President of the United States, from what we actually know and from what we see in the papers, are trying their best to unhorse the monopolies, trusts, and combinations existing in restraint of Federal trade in the United States. Why do not you Republicans help to do that by this legislation? If you propose to stand by the President, if you propose to stand by your wise Secretary of War, and he is a great Secretary, and your Bureau of Corporations, why do not you gentlemen take up the line of relief so well suggested and argued by the gentleman from Kentucky? Why do not you follow the example set by Secretary Taft, until you passed a resolution last Congress, over the protest of the Democrats, and rescue, as it were, the United States from this wilderness of monopolies in restraint of Federal commerce? Throw open the markets of the world and save the Treasury and prevent the Government from being held up in the millions and millions of dollars of supplies which you know we are obliged to buy yearly to carry on this work?

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. TAWNEY. Would the gentleman recommend going into foreign countries and purchasing armament, arms, and ammunition necessary for the defense of the United States? That is this proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I want the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] to answer the question. I asked the question primarily for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the gentleman is not talking to the subject that is under consideration.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am talking on the general proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not want to leave a question like that unanswered. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes in order to answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that we have had trouble about war supplies in times of war and of peace. The gentleman knows that Secretary Long recommended to Congress during the Spanish war the immediate establishment of a smokeless-powder plant, and we did it. The gentleman knows that the buying of our heavy shooting guns is an immense expenditure that we must meet every year. Now, as to whether we should buy the foreign gun or not would depend on circumstances. If it were shown to be a better gun than the one we have, we should buy it; and if it be shown that the gun we have to buy from our private manufacturers were at exorbitant prices and the other one was fairly as good as that, we certainly would buy some of those in foreign countries before we would be held up year after year by our home concerns and monopolies, and thus moralize with these monopolies. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that we have been forced by these monopolies, as a Government, to build our gun factories and our powder factories, to build our manufactories to make every bit of the ammunition, if necessary, or a part of it, if we so desire, that we use in our Army and our Navy. We have had to build some of our ships in Government manufactories to temper these monopolies.

We have had to establish a great manufactory supply plant at Rock Island, and the gentleman knows that we make a great many things there—harness, and so forth. Now, why have we done this? That is simply because the private manufacturers of this country have been holding up the Government of the United States, and, I may say, not only in time of peace, but in time of war. Why not in this bill provide for the equivalent of all this and say we may or can buy in the open market in case the prices are unjust?

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the Government of the United States should make herself independent in all these great governmental matters. Go back and read the messages of President Lincoln and you will find that that great President, that great and good man, said that the Government of the United States was put at a great disadvantage during the late civil war because we did not have Government factories to make some of our munitions of war. The Government of the United States should be made independent in these matters. We could run Government manufactories part of the time, or to a certain degree all of the time, and at the same time encourage the private manufacturers, so that if the private manufactories were burned down, or if the private manufactories were sold out to the enemy, or some disaster to them occurred, we would then have our own Government factories already at work to fall back on both in time of war and peace.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but I want to say that the foreign governments have that very thing. France and Italy and Japan and other foreign countries have their great government war-supplies manufactories. France and Italy have their armor-plate manufactories. We should have them, rather than be held up continuously year after year, as we have been for many years, by this Bethlehem-Carnegie combination charging us $750, the maximum price, as they did for years, for armor plate, and yet shipping the same plate to Russia and putting it upon her great men-of-war to fight her battles at $169 per ton. By the effort we have made here in Congress to establish armor factories and other factories we have driven down the price of monopolies of this country that have imposed upon the Federal Government.

I am not talking about Government ownership of railroads, unlike, I may say, the great Republican committee headed by Senator CULLOM, which reported to Congress in 1886 that sooner or later the United States may be "forced" to the Government ownership of railroads "as the surest method of securing the highest perfection and greatest efficiency of the railroad system in its entirety and the best method of making it an harmonious whole in its operation and of bringing about that uniformity and stability of rates which is the greatest need of trade and commerce."

But that is not what I have in mind. I am talking about the proposition that we are putting on our statute books provisions forcing the American Government to buy from home concerns when we know they are almost all more or less in combinations and sell at oppressive rates. Such legislation makes it harder to overcome lawless commerce and for the Government to make businesslike contracts and save the Treasury and the people from the clutches of the cormorants.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I admit that one who is a protectionist could not consistently vote to buy material abroad for the Government, and not allow our citizens to so buy without paying duty. I think there is no reason why any man, even a believer in a low tariff, should be in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, whatever we may think about the wisdom of compelling our own people to buy the ordinary merchandise from the American manufacturer; it would be extremely unwise for us to buy anything in but limited quantities of munitions of war abroad.

Now, the object of this provision is this: If the War Department hears of a new gun, a new device of any kind anywhere in the world, it buys it, if necessary brings it here, studies it, and if it should be of value, adopts it for American use, making arrangements by which it shall be produced here in America by the manufacturers of the country.

That is true of the Vickers-Maxim rapid-fire gun. It is an English model; but the American Government would not consent to buy these guns made in an English factory, so that in time of war it could purchase no repairs or any additional guns. So, while adopting an English pattern of gun, it was made a condition of its introduction into the American Army that factories should be established here and the gun produced here. Now, it seems to me, without investigating further as to what are the facts, that every man ought to see that the purchase of munitions of war for the use of the American Army abroad should only be in limited quantities. So I insist that every protectionist must, to be consistent, vote against this amendment, and every low tariff man ought to vote against it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to an inquiry?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Iowa think that the Government of the United States should permit a man in the Navy or the Army to take the time of the Government, take its machinery and the opportunities that it affords him, and he makes a discovery, and takes out a patent in his name, that he should be permitted to take that patent and sell it to foreign countries, thus arming and teaching them how they may better fight us in time of war?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not think so; but I do not think that has anything to do with the question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that is what is being done with guns and powder, too.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not know that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I know it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentleman from Kentucky, utterly unlike the gentleman to whom the remark was originally applied, "strains at a gnat, but swallows a camel." What does he accomplish by this amendment? Nothing, I submit; absolutely nothing. What does it amount to to strike out the words "in limited quantities?" I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we can not purchase munitions of war abroad in unlimited quantities. Consequently I say that if, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it becomes to the interest of the United States to make purchases abroad, he may so purchase in any quantity he sees fit. The amendment adds nothing to this. It reminds me of what my father once told me—that I should not say "a piece of string," for a string was a string whatever its length. [Applause]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky may "strain at a gnat," but I trust he is not quite as inconsistent as the gentleman who referred to him. If this amendment be of such little importance, why all of this strenuous opposition on the part of the gentleman and the distinguished chairman having the bill in charge?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The strenuosity is upon your side.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I am glad to know that the blow is sufficient to bring back a recoil. I say to you that this is not an insignificant amendment. I still say that there is no man on either side of the aisle that desires we should buy permanently our material for fortifications abroad. I say to you that every patriotic American wants to put into the hands of a patriotic Secretary of War power to prevent extortion upon the part of the American manufacturers [applause], which is the purpose of this amendment, and the only purpose. As it is now construed, the words "in limited quantities" means that the Department can only buy an insignificant quantity.

As stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] it would mean buying a chance instrument of new invention abroad, in order to have a sample. It does not give to the Secretary of War the power to say to American manufacturers, "If you forget your patriotism to such an extent that you try to hold up your Government and to force from it a false price, then we will go temporarily into the foreign market to get what the needs of the country demand and what your greed asks a false price for." Now, if that be straining at a gnat, I am proud of having done it. I think it is a matter worthy the dignity of the House.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him——

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But if the gentleman will read it again, I care not what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] or anybody else says, for I can read it as well as he can, you will see that you accomplish nothing by your amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. I beg to differ with the gentleman. I have read it perhaps a good many more times than the gentleman himself. I know that it would give additional power, and I know that if it would not we would not have had any opposition from your side. If you think it does nothing, then let it go through. What is the objection? I think it will give to your Secretary of War, whom you must believe is worthy of being trusted, a power that will enable him to prevent extortion, and that is all we ask; not that we should buy permanently abroad, or at all. It simply gives him a club to hold over the heads of American manufacturers, to prevent them charging a false price. It can do no harm. I have enough faith in Secretary Taft to know that it will not be abused, whatever the Republican side may believe about it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. SHERLEY) there were—ayes 53, noes 64.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, after line 6, add as an independent section: "For the procurement or reclamation of land or rights pertaining thereto, needed for the site, location, and construction of works for fortifications and coast defenses at the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay, $100,000."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I make the point of order against that amendment, first, that the paragraph has been passed, and second, that it is not germane to the bill, and is not pursuant to any authority of law.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, this particular paragraph may have been passed, but it is provided that it shall be added as an independent section, and so it can be offered at any place in the bill.

As to the question whether it is germane to the matter contained in this bill, there is a section on page 3 which provides for the procurement of land for fortification purposes, and this is an exact copy of the language of that section.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the amendment specifically provides that it shall be inserted on page 13, after line 6. That paragraph has been passed, and this amendment was held out of order at the last session, independently of that question.

Mr. MAYNARD. The Clerk was reading on page 13 when I offered the amendment, and we had not passed page 13.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia claim that this appropriation is pursuant to any law heretofore enacted, that it is authorized by existing law?

Mr. MAYNARD. It is a continuing work, and the building of fortifications in this country is authorized by law, and the bill for fortifications every session usually carries a provision for the appropriation of money for this purpose. This bill, on page 3, carries a provision of this character, of which the amendment is an exact copy.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending bill provides for continuing fortifications upon a general scheme, and the provisions therein are clearly in order, but it has been held heretofore, and the Chair can only follow that ruling at this time, that while a fortification appropriation bill carries general appropriations for a plan of work in progress, specific provision for intended works not authorized by law and not in progress are not in order thereon.

In accordance with that ruling, it appearing that this particular work has not been authorized by law, has not been entered upon, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment. Strike out, in line 4, the words "in limited quantities" and insert the word "temporarily."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, line 4, strike out the words "in limited quantities" and insert the word "temporarily."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that we have passed that section and an additional section has been offered by the gentleman from Virginia, and that the gentleman's motion is not now in order.

Mr. KEIFER. And, Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that we have passed on the particular language that the gentleman proposes to strike out.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the several points of order, and I will take them in inverse order to what they were offered. The gentleman from Ohio suggests that it is not in order because a motion was made by the gentleman from Kentucky to amend by striking out the words "in limited quantities," and therefore the gentleman from Ohio understands that a motion to strike out these words and insert others is the same, in effect, as a motion to strike out and not insert anything.

The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that the section has been passed. Now, if there is anything we have beyond this section, my copy does not show what it is. The last performance, except the offering of a provision by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MAYNARD], which was ruled out, was the consideration of this very section and this very clause. I think the gentleman from Iowa is perhaps drawing the line a little close on this matter of time. If that is the best objection that can be offered to the amendment, if seems to me the gentleman from Iowa will see the propriety of not being very strenuous. I do not think the objection is a good one, and, not being a good one, I do not think it ought to be urged. I do not think it is good, for we have not commenced on anything else. There is nothing to commence on. We have finished the bill, and there is nothing further in the bill to devote our attention to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is a close one. The gentleman from Virginia having offered an amendment by a new paragraph, if that had been entertained, the motion of the gentleman from Missouri would be too late beyond question; but that not having been entertained, it can scarcely be held that the paragraph is passed, and consequently the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. DE ARMOND. And the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio, I suppose, Mr. Chairman, virtually overrules itself. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. That is a parliamentary rule which, unless modified by special rule, has always been the practice.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Well, Mr. Chairman, the object of this provision, I assume, is to enable the Secretary of War to make purchases of material and expend the large sum of money which he is authorized to expend under the act so as to protect the Government, in case of necessity, against a hold-up by somebody who is an American. If the person holding up the Government and filching from the Treasury, endeavoring to take advantage of circumstances to be extortionate in dealing with this country and our countrymen were a foreigner, I suppose there would be no man here who would be found to apologize for or defend him. Then, the defense and apology, I assume, must rest entirely on the proposition that the would-be wrongdoer, the extortioner, the man who, under the pretense and color of law, would rob his Government when the Government is buying the necessary material for the defense and protection of the country, being an American, the robbery ought to be condoned and justified. Why "in limited quantities?"

Are you afraid of the exercise of discretion on the part of the Secretary of War, or do you wish to protect the Government just a little, and if the demand is for large quantities, allow the extortion to go the main length, but stop it before the entire robbery is complete? Suppose it becomes necessary for the Secretary of War, or it is desirable, in the interest of the country, to promote its welfare or to prepare for its defense, to buy a large quantity of material at one time, to expend a great sum of money, then, under the wording of this provision, as we have it, the Secretary of War would either be powerless to stop the hand of the robber, or he could only do it partially. He might prevent him from robbery to the extent of forty or fifty thousand dollars, but must suffer him to rob to the extent of millions. Now, if that is the purpose of this provision, well and good; let it be left as it is, with full understanding. If the object be, as it ought to be, to enable the Secretary of War to stand between the Treasury and the interests of the United States and the would-be robbers, whether American or foreign, let him be given the power, and then if he fails to exercise it in case of necessity, the responsibility will rest upon him and not upon this House. If there be no necessity, the provision will be harmless. The provision itself would stand as a warning, if it were made broad enough and ample for the purpose, and a notice to all men who would be extortioners at the expense of the Government not to try to draw from the Treasury that to which they are not entitled, because if they should do so they would lose legitimate profits by force of the power vested in the Secretary of War to make the purchases elsewhere, whether they be large or small. Now, the word "temporarily" limits more than I would limit, if I had the power to extend the protective power, but it is not a limitation as to quantity, it is a limitation as to time. It is a limitation for a particular emergency which may arise, whether at that time the Government desires to purchase large or desires to purchase little, whether it involves thousands or hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars. The temporary emergency would be met by the exercise of the temporary power. I believe the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that the Clerk read the paragraph as it would be if the amendment were adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the paragraph as requested.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all material purchased under the foregoing provisions of this act shall be of American manufacture, except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases temporarily abroad, which material shall be admitted free of duty, as shall other similar material furnished without charge.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I understood, as well as I could hear, the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] to contend that the language now in the bill left the situation such as to work a robbery of some kind. If I am mistaken in my hearing or my construction, I will be corrected. But now he proposes that we shall not buy abroad permanently at all, so that we are to stand and elongate our robbery all the time, and add to it; that we are to go abroad and spend money to buy something temporarily, but not to be used in any permanent way. This is to augment the gentleman's great idea of robbery. The object of the bill is to give a discretion to the Secretary of War, or to the purchasing power, to buy in limited quantities goods or materials of any kind that were needed, to use them permanently, but we are to get them temporarily now if we adopt this amendment, and then buy permanently afterwards—not for use, but we are to have a proposition to go abroad for some temporary thing, and then buy at home permanently later. I think the bill is right—that we should use our own material where we can, but if there is an emergency, or somebody proposes to rob us, to use the words of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, we will buy in limited quantities abroad so as to regulate that—and therefore I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, having found the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], as I judge from what he has stated here, fully in sympathy with the purpose of protecting the Government, I am indeed pained that the gentleman is constrained to oppose this amendment. The gentleman from Ohio, if I understand him, understands this amendment to mean that there shall be authority given to the Secretary of War to buy things temporarily—that is, to buy a gun for a salute and then to send it back [laughter], to buy the material for fortification to put up a wall on which a gun might be mounted, and then later to take it down and send the material back.

Mr. KEIFER. That is what the amendment proposes. [Laughter.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. That is what the understanding of the gentleman is as to what the amendment means. Inasmuch as the gentleman is so much in sympathy with the purpose of protecting the Government, I hope that his fellow Members on the other side will adopt his avowed purpose and then give their own understanding to an interpretation of the language which I have employed. If so, this amendment, I am quite confident, will be adopted without a dissenting vote, unless it should be the vote of the gentleman from Ohio on his own construction of the language of the amendment.

Buying temporarily is to buy for temporary use, as I understand the gentleman from Ohio. "Temporarily" I thought, and I yet think—I say this modestly and with deference—I thought and yet think "temporarily" has reference to the time, the period of time, of the buying, and that it does not have anything to do, as the gentleman from Ohio seems to think, and evidently does think—I assume he thinks; I take it his conclusion stated is the result of thought—that it has reference to the use of the article bought and not to the time to be consumed in the acquisition of a particular article. Now, I felt I ought to say this much, Mr. Chairman, having offered this amendment, lest I might be understood by the gentleman from Ohio—I am satisfied I might not be misunderstood by anyone else—as really trying to circumscribe the power of the Secretary of War. Perish the thought, Mr. Chairman, that in this presence, in this House and against the influence of the gentleman from Ohio, I would have the temerity to try to lessen any power given to the Secretary of War, or to anybody else, to protect the Government against any kind of extortion. Now, then, if we really could adopt this amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Well, the time having expired, and having great regard for the rules, I shall not endeavor to trespass by speaking longer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, division on this; I would like to see the brethren vote standing.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman from Ohio just vote "temporarily" with us?

The committee again divided, and there were—ayes 53, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "limited quantities" and insert the words "any quantity."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 4, strike out the words "limited quantities" and insert the words "any quantity."

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say just a few words upon that, not that it raises any new proposition, but I am inspired to say something very largely from the conviction that the other amendment must have been lost in consequence of the House having been misled by the definition of the gentleman from Ohio. The amendment is lost just the same, whether lost owing to a difference in lexicographers or lost for some other reason. This leaves, I think, nothing of doubt, even to the mind of the gentleman from Ohio. I believe this amendment would mean, according to the conception of everybody, that the Secretary of War could buy abroad substantially in case of necessity. Let us see what the paragraph is for anyhow:

That all material purchased under the foregoing provision of this act shall be of American manufacture—

It is a general, broad statement—

except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases in limited quantities abroad.

What kind of purchases? Why, say the gentlemen, in limited quantities.

It can not be to the manifest interest of the United States or to the interest of the United States at all, no matter what the threatened robbery is, no matter what the certainty of its perpetration unless some means of escaping it be provided—certainly there can not be any manifest interest of the United States—to protect itself against anything more than a little of the threatened robbery. Now, this ought to be put in harmony. I am satisfied my friend from Iowa will sympathize with my purpose, whether he entirely agrees with me as to what will be accomplished by its execution. I suggest that there is a want of harmony between the proclamation and the concluding part, between the whereas, as it were, and the resolution; between the words of hope and the fulfillment to be found later on. The general proposition is that articles of American manufacture shall be purchased. Nobody is trying to interfere with it. When is the exception to come in? Carefully worded, the fine Italian hand of the gentleman from Iowa can be traced easily in these words, "in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States" to make purchases abroad. Now, that would read pretty well as it is, as I have read it, but no.

That would not do. These purchases have to be limited. Then the manifest interest of the United States has curbs, and bars, and checks. Let the United States be protected in part. Oh yes, but do not let the Government have everything, hold it down to nickel purchases, but when it comes to the dollar transactions then the manifest interest of the United States comes down before the manifest interests of the American persons who deal with the United States.

Now, I appeal to the pride of my friend from Iowa in the symmetry of things. Does my friend from Iowa really desire to perpetrate in solemn legislative form an absurdity, a mere pretense to guard the interests of the United States? These manifest interests of the United States, are they to be guarded only against manifest robbery by piecemeal? Protected only partly or half way? Great God, if a man were to offer an amendment here that the War Secretary might purchase abroad when robbery is certain and impending, half of what it is to the manifest interest of the United States to purchase abroad, there would be trouble.

Not only would the new dictionary be swung into the breach, but there would be—I do not know what kind of "reasons" interposed. I do not know what sorts of "reasons" are offered.

Who is to be hurt by the adoption of such an amendment as this? The American people in general? Any institution of the American Republic? Any legitimate interest of it? No. The extortioner! Do you propose to turn the Government over manacled and bound to the extortioner, with the slight modification that the extortion may be checked "in limited quantities?" Let most of it go, but save something for the sake of grace and form! Limited quantities! Now, I say, "in any quantity." Is that too much? Why do you parcel this sort of robbery? It is only when it is to the manifest interest of the United States that the purchases be made abroad that the Secretary is to be authorized in any event to make them. Now, then, how absurd! You have assumed a manifest interest——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to have a few minutes more, because I am at a very interesting part of this discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the time of the gentleman will be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I am trying now, Mr. Chairman, to convert the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH]. I failed, and I admit my failure with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], but I have hopes of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], because so far he has not swung in any dictionary against me.

Mr. Chairman, it is only when the manifest interests of the United States demand it, when there is a loud call heard by the Secretary of War, in the interest of honesty and to protect the Treasury of the United States from spoliation, that any part of this provision for purchases abroad comes into play, and then how far shall it come in? Oh, only "in limited quantities!" It must not do much to the extortioners. It must not interfere with the legitimate business of robbery, barring curtailment in limited quantities.

It is an absurd proposition, Mr. Chairman, in all seriousness. Either take it out and get away from the pretense or put in something that amounts to something. Either enable the Secretary of War to protect the United States, if there be need for it, or boldly and openly deny to him and deny to every other agent of the Government all ability to protect.

Have one thing or the other. Come up and get on one side or the other. Get off the fence and come down on one side. You see we have very old and very good authority for the proposition that you can not be on two sides. You can not serve God and mammon, you know. In other words, you can not, in this question of a Government contract, protect your country and at the same time protect those who are its despoilers. Can you not determine whom you will stand for? If you try to stand for both, the country, as always happens in such cases, will be the sufferer. Now, for once, come up and stand for the country, even against the protective plutocrats who would despoil her.

This, I believe, is the 21st day of March. Make it a red-letter day in our calendar! Do something notable here to-day. Do something here to-day that really means something for the country. Or, if you are not going to do that, for once throw pretense to the winds and go wrong boldly.

Let us consider these words "in limited quantities."

That expression is a little vague. Can you not trim that down somehow and put in a few other qualifiers? For instance, say "in very limited limited quantities," or "in diminutive quantities," or "in infinitesimal quantities," or say anything to save the color, at least. Put it in the phraseology of the breezy West, the free and honest West, and say, "Let the hide go, but save the tail." [Laughter.] Put something of that kind in. Make your language picturesque, at least. As you have it, it is solemnly farcical. The farcical character of it, the humor of it, is intensified and made keener by the gravity of the phraseology. Manifest destiny calls upon the Secretary of War to protect the United States from spoliation. Ah, then, the Secretary of War shall have the power to do it. Then the United States shall have the guardian on duty at the door of the Treasury to protect it "in limited quantities." [Laughter.]

I appeal to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] as the leader upon this matter—as I said before, my appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] having failed, and I offered a second amendment to get a second chance—I appeal to him to trust a little more to the Secretary of War. Give him a little more of a chance. Better risk the Treasury with him than to risk it with these fellows whose operations make it to the manifest interest of the United States to purchase abroad.

But I do not care to say anything more about it. I am now expecting, and let me hope that I shall not be disappointed. This is a world of disappointments. It is a world of expectations, a world of bright anticipations, and a world of disappointments. Now, I am indulging in the expectations and anticipations. Let not the gentleman from Iowa dash these with disappointment. Let us do something now, or let us simply change the programme and not pretend to do something. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman appeals to my pride to yield upon the proposition that he now makes. As suggested by one of my friends, my pride is "in limited quantities." I think that I can show before I am through that the pride of the gentlemen on the other side on this subject ought to be in exceedingly limited quantities. When did this language originally come into the bill? Now the gentleman suggested that it is my "fine, artistic work." "Perish the thought" that I am entitled to such distinguished credit as that. I want to tell the gentleman when the language originated, where it originated, and from whom it came.

In the election of 1890 the Democratic party elected not only an overwhelming majority of the Members of Congress but elected for the first time since the civil war a majority of all the Members from the Northern States; and the first time that this language was ever written in the fortification law was by that Democratic Congress elected in 1890. [Great laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I want to read the language for the instruction of the gentleman from Missouri. I read from the fortification bill, approved July 23, 1892—

That all material purchased under the foregoing provisions of this act shall be of American manufacture, except in cases where, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases in limited quantities abroad, which material shall be admitted free of duty.

[Great laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

My pride does not extend to the modificaton of this, the first product of the Democratic party restored to power in the House of Representatives of the United States. [Laughter and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman has an amendment pending.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there was a Democratic House elected in 1890; but my recollection serves me ill if there was not a Republican Senate along about that time. How was that? I rather think that there was, and with that maybe there was a Republican President then. The gentleman from Iowa has shown that with the small leaven of a Democratic House in the tripartite division of the agencies that make the laws, a Republican President and a Republican Senate, they had managed to do this much; and that is the best defense that I have heard yet offered in opposition to the amendments that have been proposed upon this.

Gentlemen do well when they cite Democratic precedents; but it is not a Democratic precedent, because the Democratic House constituted only one-third of the law-making power, the Senate being Republican. The best that can be said, then, upon this subject is that when the Democrats had one-third of the power to legislate and put this anywhere, it was put in where it was not before. Therefore my hope has fallen in the gentleman from Iowa. Therefore the gentleman from Iowa has given us no better reason for not going further and doing better now. That seems to be about all he has done.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. You were in full power, both with the President and the Senate since then, and did not attempt to modify that provision.

Mr. DE ARMOND. That goes to another question. My amendment should be rejected now, because once the Democrats had in the Senate, by counting all the odds and ends against all the elements of dyed-in-the-wool Republicanism under the sun, a majority on paper of one. [Laughter on the Republican side.] My friends, do not be too facetious over that. The time may not be far distant when, in order to get any kind of a majority, you will be forced to count all the odds and ends. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Because at one time there was a Democratic President and a Democratic House, and a majority of one on paper in the Senate, there was not something better done, it has occurred to the gentleman from Iowa that there ought to be nothing better done now. Let us sum up for a moment. First, there ought not to be anything better done "when the manifest interest of the United States requires," because the Democratic party, when they had one House of Congress did not do any better; second, because they did not do anything better when they had the Government for a short period—the House, the President, and a nominal majority of one in the Senate.

I wish this could be determined upon a matter of reasonable argument. I wish there was some opportunity of submitting this question: Shall the powers of the Secretary of War be enlarged to protect the Government of the United States, or shall they not be enlarged, upon the ground that this is the best the Democrats did when they did the best they could do? I wish we could vote upon that proposition, but we can not, so we will have to take it in a lump. Another hope has failed. Apparently the gentleman from Iowa is going to vote as the gentleman from Ohio voted upon another proposition; and if the majority sustain them, we will have done this: We will have said that in a case where the manifest interests of the United States require large purchases abroad only small ones shall be made. I am willing to leave it there, and let the country judge of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. You quoted from ancient authority, and now I want to quote from modern authority. Mr. Chairman, on June 25, 1906, the President of the United States approved this resolution:

Resolved, etc., That purchases of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal shall be restricted to articles of domestic production or manufacture from the lowest responsible bidder, unless the President shall in any case deem the bids or tenders therefor to be extortionate or unreasonable.

The Democrats voted against this resolution, the Republicans for it.

Now, did the President find so many things "extortionate and unreasonable" that you in this bill run back and adopt this language? Why, Mr. Chairman, have the Republicans receded; why have they gone back to a rule that was applied twenty years ago?

Mr. Chairman, last Congress Secretary Taft recommended this:

Resolved, That purchases of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal shall be restricted to articles of domestic production or manufacture, unless the President deem the bids therefor to be unreasonable.

You defeated that.

In the Senate the Republicans also refused to adopt this resolution of a Democrat, Senator Carmack:

That in all the contracts for the purchase of equipment and material for use in the construction of the Panama Canal, preference shall be given to articles of domestic production or manufacture, conditions of quality and price being equal.

You Republicans defeated that, gentlemen. Now, why has the Republican party abandoned the language of 1906 and gone back to the language that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] says the Democratic party provided in a law in 1890, long before combinations of this country had risen up to be giants to flay the people and rob the Treasury of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why have you receded? I ask you Republicans as a matter of information. Let us read the language of 1906 again. I do not want to misquote the Republicans.

Unless the President shall in any case deem the bids or tenders therefor to be extortionate or unreasonable.

Now, I ask my learned friend from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], why have you abandoned that language and retreated to this language? I await a reply.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] is always fair and generally accurate. He made a statement a minute ago that this provision appeared for the first time in a bill passed in June, 1892, by a Democratic House elected by an overwhelming majority in 1890. The gentleman did not rely upon his own information, or he would not have been so inaccurate. The gentleman gave the information as it was given to him. I have not had an opportunity to go any further back than the preceding year, February 24, 1891, when they had a Republican Congress, the Fifty-first Congress, known as the "Reed House."

Mr. KEIFER. That same Congress was sitting in 1892, was it not?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. No; because it expired on the 4th of March, 1891. The gentleman from Ohio can recollect a great many years back, but he is not always accurate in his recollection. This provision is:

That all material purchased under the foregoing provisions of this act shall be of American manufacture, except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases in limited quantities abroad, which materials shall be admitted free of duty.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

So, if it went into a bill passed by a Democratic House in 1892, it was but following the bad example of the Republican House prior thereto. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, the words "in limited quantities" should be stricken out, and for this reason: You can not buy proportionately 100 pounds for the same price that you can buy a thousand. You will have to pay more when you buy limited quantities—more for a thousand pounds, in proportion, than you will if you buy a hundred thousand pounds. Competition in this country along the lines provided for in the bill before the House is very limited. So, for this reason, if exorbitant prices are charged in this country, we should authorize the Secretary of War to purchase abroad whenever goods can be purchased cheaper than in this country. Give the preference, by all means, to Americans; but if they want to take advantage by charging trust prices, then let us buy abroad. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. DE ARMOND) there were—ayes 75, noes 70.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered. The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. SMITH of Iowa and Mr. DE ARMOND.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 85, noes 82.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I wish to offer.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that at the end of the fifteen minutes allotted to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], the committee do rise and report the bill with amendment to the House with the recommendation that the bill, as amended, do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposed amendment by the gentleman from Nebraska has precedence over the motion of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is the gentleman's amendment to the last section?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after line 6, page 13, the following: "Provided, No money appropriated in this bill shall be used in payment of goods of American manufacture when it shall be made known to the Secretary of War that the same are sold abroad for lower prices than in America."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. I make a point of order to that amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to know what the point of order is.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is new legislation, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the law at present, as I understand it, authorizes the Secretary of War to purchase certain munitions of war in foreign markets in limited quantities. As I understand the amendment, it is not only a limitation on the appropriation carried in the bill, but changes existing law in respect to the purchase of munitions of war in foreign countries.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is in the form of a limitation. I am not able to lay my hand on the ruling that has been made, but my recollection is that the identical proposition has been ruled upon before.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And in order.

Mr. MANN. It may have been ruled in order. I thought that possibly we might discuss the question in the House while it was being ascertained what it was, but if the gentleman has the ruling, very well. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, while I say it is in the form of a limitation, it may well be held that it does change existing law, because the law now provides how these expenditures shall be made. This proposition would change the law, namely, providing that no part of the money appropriated shall be expended for the purchase of a certain class of goods under certain circumstances which, in fact, changes the law that provides for the sale of goods to the lowest bidder; and in that respect it is clearly a change of existing law. The law provides that the goods shall be advertised for and shall be purchased from the lowest responsible bidder. This changes that law and provides that the goods shall no longer be purchased from the lowest responsible bidder, and while in form of a limitation, and while it is true the House can restrict the expenditure of money, it has been repeatedly held that an amendment in the form of a limitation which in effect changes existing law, which seeks to accomplish indirectly what the rules do not permit to be accomplished directly, is a change of law, and hence not in order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAPRON). The Chair, after examining the amendment carefully and receiving advice which no one can dispute, is ready to rule. The amendment provides that no money appropriated in this bill shall be used in the payment for goods of American manufacture when it shall be made known to the Secretary of War that the same are sold abroad for lower prices. It seems to the Chair that that can be construed in no other way than a limitation, and consequently the Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in behalf of this amendment that it meets some objections which gentlemen raised on the other side against other amendments offered upon the last paragraph of the bill. Certainly there can be no possible excuse for allowing the United States Government to pay to American manufacturers prices higher than those manufacturers receive from other governments and other customers abroad.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. I assume that the gentleman has given study to the subject. Who would determine and how would it be determined as to whether goods were sold abroad at lower prices? Would it be the duty of the War Department to ascertain with reference to all contracts made abroad or learn the prices of all materials abroad——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me answer the question the gentleman has put——

Mr. MANN. I have not finished it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I considered that objection might be made, and I have said in my amendment that the Secretary shall only refuse to buy American-made goods when it has been shown to him that those identical goods are sold abroad at lower prices; and, Mr. Chairman, this is not a matter in which there will be a great amount of difficulty in demonstrating that American-made goods are being sold abroad at lower prices than they are sold in this country. For some time there was a denial of this charge, but it has become a matter of notoriety that a large proportion of all the various goods manufactured by the tariff-protected American trusts are being sold in many foreign countries at prices lower than they are being sold in this country. The first attempt to controvert those charges has been abandoned, and we now find that some of the gentlemen who originally denied the charges arise occasionally to excuse them upon one reason or another. It has been clearly proven, for instance, Mr. Chairman, that American watches are being sold abroad at prices much lower than they are sold at home, where they are made under the protection of this Dingley tariff. It has been shown that American steel rails are being sold in the markets of London, after the payment of freight, at prices lower than they are being sold to the American railroads, which are compelled to buy the trust-made American rails——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has been shown typewriters are being sold abroad at prices far below the prices they are sold in this country under the protective tariff. It has been shown that sewing machines are being sold abroad at prices much less than they are being sold in this country——

Mr. TAWNEY. Can you buy sewing machines under the appropriation made in this bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has been shown American plows are being sold abroad by the American trust at prices far below what they are sold to the American farmers. I mention these only as specimens of the trust programme. It has been shown that self-binders and other agricultural implements are sold cheaper abroad than to American farmers. So also that paper made by the American paper trust is being sold in foreign countries cheaper than it is sold to the consumers in this country, and so on. Oil and oil products——

Several MEMBERS. And armor plate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; and other goods, possibly armor plate; and now we have offered to say to the Secretary of War, "You shall not pay American money to American manufacturers for goods which these same manufacturers sell abroad to foreign governments at lower prices than they sell to the United States." Can the Republican party afford to go on record as against such a limitation upon an expenditure out of the Treasury? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I endeavored to interrupt the gentleman from Nebraska during his remarks for the purpose of asking him if he understood that the appropriation bill which we have been considering, namely, the fortification appropriation bill, authorized the purchase of sewing machines, steel rails, and typewriters, for the purpose of showing how absolutely irrelevant is the argument he made in support of his amendment. Everybody knows that there is nothing authorized to be purchased in this bill except that which relates to the arms, armament, or munitions of war. Now, the gentleman upon the other side is evidently endeavoring to create the impression that we are about to pass an appropriation bill under which the Secretary of War is authorized to purchase any old thing that he may see fit. They seek to create the impression that on this side of the House we favor purchasing material other than war material regardless of cost. Our opposition to this amendment is because we propose to not rely upon any foreign government, I care not where it is, for our munitions of war or articles which we may require for the defense of our country. We can manufacture them ourselves if the individual manufacturer charges more than he should. The war material we provide for in this bill should be either purchased here or manufactured here. And the amendment should be voted down.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened very attentively to the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]. It is an ad captandum argument, I take it. He knows, of course, that this amendment would apply to smokeless powder and armor plate, and if at any time the American manufacturers of smokeless powder or armor plate were selling those products cheaper abroad than at home, this amendment would apply and save the Government that much expense.

Mr. TAWNEY. For the information of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] I will say that there is no armor plate purchased under this appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The fortification armor is to be bought, whether to be put upon ships or not. And then I see a provision "for the repair of railroad tracks" in a certain part of the bill. So that one of the things referred to by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to wit, steel rails, comes directly into play. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing sillier in the world than to have a government pay duty into the treasury upon goods bought for the government through one department, or paying a price with the duty added to it on one hand by one department of the government, while it takes the money out of the same treasury in behalf of another department. It is simply a question of cancellation.

Now, the truth is that nine-tenths of the Republican party probably in this country, if confronted with the single proposition of doing away with a condition under which the American manufacturers could continue to sell cheaper abroad than to their own people or their own Government, would be willing to do away with that condition. The truth is that you dare not, even in the most insignificant particular, make a break in this endless chain of protective industries which are robbing the American people. You are afraid to vote for a most palpable, plain, obvious provision of justice, if it takes a hundred thousand dollars away from the combined trusts, for fear that you shall have broken the arch of your structure and will let other "depredators" in upon your system—the depredators being the American consumers, whom you are yearly robbing, and their depredation consisting in buying what they must have cheaper.

Just a moment ago you were positively united in indulging in the fine art of saying that you would not give your own Secretary of War the power to stop exploitation of your own Government, except "in limited quantities." You would not give him power to do it in unlimited quantities, and here you are going to stand in a few minutes—every man of you, with perhaps one or two or three exceptions, and I do not hope for as many as three—announcing to the country that you think it is right for American manufacturers of smokeless powder, for American manufacturers of rails, for American manufacturers of guns, to sell to their own Government, protected by their own Government's protective tariff shelter law, at a higher price than they sell to other governments who at some time in the future may be deadly antagonistic on the field of battle with your own. What does the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] amount to? Nobody is saying here that the Federal Government shall buy abroad instead of at home. We are merely saying that under certain contingencies it may buy when it can buy cheaper abroad than at home; that under certain contingencies it may refuse to buy from American producers. When? In the judgment of your own Secretary they are exploiting your own Government. These particular American producers are robbing the United States Government by selling to it at a price higher than they sell to others abroad—in this particular case to other governments, because munitions of war are sold to governments rather than to private individuals. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the language of this amendment, and that it does not provide that this money may be expended abroad; that the provision is that no money appropriated in this bill shall be used in payment for goods of American manufacture when it shall be made known to the Secretary of War that the same are sold abroad for lower prices than in America.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, we have already adopted an amendment providing for the purchase of goods abroad.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that objection will not lie.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The provision is that you must buy goods at home except when it is to the manifest interest of the United States to buy abroad.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It certainly would be.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In my judgment it would certainly not be. In other words, in these particular matters of national defense we are peculiarly interested in building up American institutions capable of producing our material. It is wholly different from any tariff proposition. We can better afford to pay more money than the goods would cost abroad to have them produced here, in these lines, independently of any tariff proposition whatever. It is absurd for gentlemen to be making a patriotic appeal to this House about buying American munitions and material of war manufactured in some foreign land. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I like to hear of patriotism and high purposes, but it is nonsense for a man to claim that in seeking to transfer to foreign lands the production of American material of war he is actuated solely by lofty, patriotic motives. Nor am I questioning the patriotism of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does not the gentleman realize that if the amendment is adopted and becomes law, that these very manufacturing concerns will sell to this Government at the same rate as they do to foreign governments?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman assumes that the manufacturing establishments are now in the United States. Now, when we adopted the Vickers-Maxim gun that very question arose. We could not get one of them except in a foreign land, and we stipulated that they must found an American factory for the production of those guns before we would introduce them into the American Army at all. Now, I presume that they charged us more for those guns than they would have done if they manufactured them in their foreign factory, with foreign labor, at a place where we could not get them in time of war.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not state the question correctly. He takes the position that this newly established factory in this country would sell abroad. The American factory so specially established would sell to no one but the United States. Without the amendment which I have offered, the Department can purchase goods made in American factories doing business not only with the United States but with foreign countries, and giving those foreign countries a great advantage in price.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman misunderstood me. Now, I ask the gentleman to give us his judgment, if it should happen if we should adopt some foreign form of arm, and we wanted in future to establish that factory, when it would be subject to seizure in time of war, whether the gentleman says it would be wrong for them to sell for a higher price an arm made in that factory than for making the arm in a foreign factory by foreign labor?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This amendment applies only to American manufacturers who sell their American-made goods in foreign countries cheaper than in the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I understand.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The gentleman is referring to a case in which the American factory is established simply for the purpose of making and selling a foreign arm to the United States. My amendment does not affect that. It only reaches an American manufacturing concern which makes goods in America and then sells them cheaper, say, in Europe than in America.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Would they buy foreign guns—guns not made in American factories?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It says "American-made goods" in plain language. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This proposition is plain, that we ought to be able to hold forth encouragement to have these establishments here and pay them a higher price in order to get them to manufacture here rather than to manufacture them abroad, even though the factories thus founded should sell cheaper abroad than here.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, outside of the broad question which is involved, and with which I am not in sympathy with the gentleman from Nebraska, there is somewhat a technical question involved in the amendment. Under the terms of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Nebraska the sale of the goods abroad is not confined to sale by the manufacturers. In case there were two bidders for goods to sell to the Government and one of them was the lowest bidder, if the other bidder should persuade some one in England to buy goods at their factory and sell them abroad, the Government would be forbidden to let the contract to the lowest bidder and be forced to let the bid to the highest bidder.

The mere statement of the case shows the absurdity of the amendment as it now reads. Of course the gentleman will say that that is not the intention of the amendment. Very likely. That shows that the form of the amendment is not well considered, because in a competition between bidders tricks are frequently resorted to where they can be resorted to, and there is nothing to prevent that in this amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it does frequently occur that the manufacturers here may have an opportunity to enter into competition with foreign manufacturers in selling goods in the Orient, say. It is undoubtedly true that both England and Germany and America at times sell goods in China and Japan at less prices than they sell at home.

And it seems to me that this side of the House, maintaining the principles it has maintained for years, can well afford to vote against a proposition of this sort, which has no application to this bill, and which is intended merely for campaign purposes across the line of the Missouri. I do not wish to participate in the contest between the gentlemen on the two sides of the Missouri River—at Omaha and Council Bluffs—but I sympathize with both of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. HITCHCOCK) there were—ayes 77, noes 108.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, let us have tellers on that.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. SMITH of Iowa and Mr. HITCHCOCK.

The committee again divided and there were—ayes 88, noes 110.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I now move to strike out the last paragraph of the bill and insert the following substitute therefor:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the last paragraph of the bill and insert:

"That all material purchased under the provisions of this act shall be of American manufacture, except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases in limited quantities abroad; such material, purchased in limited quantities, shall be admitted free of duty, as shall other similar material furnished without charge."

Mr. SHERLEY. I make the point of order against the amendment. It raises the same subject-matter that the committee has just expressed its view upon. It undertakes to restore and put back what the committee determined to change.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it is a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not for the Chair to enter into the question of the consistency of an amendment or the intent of an amendment. On its face it is a different amendment from the original proposition, as the gentleman will appreciate.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the Chair permit me to see the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be pleased to do so. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. The substitute offered in lieu of the paragraph as amended by the committee makes a change by striking out the word "foregoing," in the first line; by striking out the word "which," before the word "material," and then substituting the word "such," and by inserting the words "purchased in limited quantities;" and otherwise it is in accordance with the paragraph previously perfected. If it be in order simply by amplifying an amendment by adding certain words, to have a reconsideration of it and a vote in committee, it will be impossible for the committee ever to arrive at any conclusion to report to the House. Now, I submit to the Chair that it would be in order for the gentleman from Iowa to offer the words "purchased in limited quantities" after the word "material," which would have looked to a further perfection of the paragraph; but now to move to so perfect as to undo what the committee has done is to make a circle of parliamentary proceeding and to lead the committee nowhere.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not proposing to perfect it; I am proposing a substitute for it.

Mr. MANN. The universal parliamentary rule is that a substitute can not be put to the House so long as there are amendments pending to perfect the original paragraph. Up to this time there have been amendments proposed for the purpose of perfecting the original paragraph. The gentleman from Iowa now, at the proper time under parliamentary practice, offers a substitute, proposing to strike out the paragraph entirely and substitute another paragraph for it. The substitute offered could not have been offered prior to this time, because up to this time amendments have been offered to the original proposition in the bill, and for the first time the gentleman from Iowa has an opportunity to do what he is now doing, moving to substitute a paragraph in place of the one in the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair will permit, in furtherance of my point of order, I would say that if the substitute makes a change of law from the paragraph as it exists, it would seem to be subject to a point of order, because it is not based on existing law and undertakes to legislate upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. He suggests that this is the earliest period at which a substitute could be offered, and that a substitute can be offered for perfecting the paragraph. The gentleman jumps one little hurdle in the progress of his argument. Does the gentleman mean that you can offer a substitute for a paragraph which the House has amended, because you call it a substitute? A substitute is in the nature of an amendment, and while you can offer a substitute for a paragraph that has or has not been amended, the same rule precisely applies for determining whether or not the substitute is in order that applies when there is a proposition to make an amendment that the House has declined to make, to restore what the House has stricken out; so it brings it back to the proposition stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], whether there is any substantial difference between what is now offered as a so-called "substitute" and what before was in the passage as reported and has been changed by vote of the House. Calling it a substitute does not change its character and nature and does not make it admissible under that name if it would not be admissible under another name.

To make a test, suppose the proposition was to restore in precisely the same words by way of a substitute the language that the House before amended, would the gentleman from Illinois or anybody else contend that that would be admissible?

Mr. MANN. I would not.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Exactly; and so the gentleman did not complete his argument. So it comes back to the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky that it is merely a juggling with words, and under a pretext depended upon to be sustained by a majority under the pretext that it is a new proposition, it has really submitted to the committee again the old proposition; in other words, having gathered in a few more votes, the proposition now is to undo what was done before. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the fact that the Chair does not consider it the same proposition, and the gentleman could not so construe it, the Chair is assured, if he will read it carefully. It is a substantial change of words, and it is not for the Chair to say what the effect of it is.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think the gentleman from Kentucky has answered that, and I was devoting myself to the persuasive proposition of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is a perfectly plain case that the Chair can not determine the meaning of the amendment offered in the House. The Chair must permit the House to determine whether the substitute is a different proposition from the one in the bill. It is for the House to determine; the House votes on that proposition. The Chair does not undertake to determine whether the new language means precisely the same thing as the paragraph did before. It is a new proposition different from the one in the bill and can be voted upon now for the first time, and hence is in order.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair will permit, the Chair must determine many matters of construction. The Chair frequently determines on a point of order whether the amendment offered in the form of a limitation is really a limitation or whether its effect is to change existing law. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, carried to its logical conclusion, means that by offering an amendment over again, and simply saying "I offer it as a substitute," it becomes a substitute, and the Chair must become entirely lacking in intelligence and say: "It is not within the province of the Chair to determine whether it is the same matter or proposition." That is absolutely destructive of parliamentary proceeding. The whole theory of parliamentary law is to have an orderly procedure that leads to a conclusion. I submit to the Chair if it is possible under the guise of a substitute to raise the identical question upon which the Committee of the Whole House has already acted? It is simply working in a circle and is against the fundamental reason of parliamentary law.

The CHAIRMAN. If the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky applied in its entirety to the proposition, the gentleman would be correct, but as it does not, the gentleman is entirely in error, and the Chair would like to offer further proof by asking the Clerk to read from Jefferson's Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

If an amendment be proposed inconsistent with one already agreed to, it is a fit ground for its rejection by the House, but not within the competence of the Speaker to suppress as if it were against order. For were he permitted to draw questions of consistence within the vortex of order, he might usurp a negative on important modifications and suppress instead of subserving the legislative will.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the Chair rule on the further point of order that if the substitute offered for the paragraph as amended be a change, it is legislation upon an appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling of the Chair in overruling the point of order would certainly cover the proposition last stated by the gentleman from Kentucky. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. DE ARMOND), there were—ayes 114, noes 95.

Mr. SHERLEY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided, and the tellers (Mr. SMITH of Iowa and Mr. SHERLEY) reported that there were—ayes 108, noes 84.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation, and upon the expiration of the fifteen minutes allotted to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] I move that the committee do rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendment be adopted and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the House made a serious mistake yesterday in tabling the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. I know something about the legislation creating the Bureau of Corporations and the intention of the men who had that legislation in view, and I can say it was the purpose of the men who wrote that law into the statute books that the Bureau of Corporations should furnish Congress with information, as well as the President. If that Bureau has any information such as this resolution calls for, we should be in possession of it, as well as the President. In my opinion, that resolution was parliamentary. It did not ask for anything incompatible with public interests, and, in my opinion, it should have been passed, and if there is any information that will guide us to better legislation we should be in possession of it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] opposed the adoption of that resolution and made the motion to lay it on the table. He said in his speech regarding the law creating the Bureau of Corporations:

I believe it is a right law, and I claim the credit of having originated the idea of the Bureau of Corporations and putting that provision into the law creating the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. Chairman, I asked the gentleman when he finished his speech to yield me five minutes in order to correct that statement. The gentleman declined to yield me the five minutes. I then asked for unanimous consent to address the House in order to correct that statement, and the gentleman from Illinois, who had misinformed this House, objected to my having five minutes by unanimous consent. Now, sir, let us take the RECORD in regard to the creation of this Bureau of Corporations. We Democrats work so hard here that if we can possibly accomplish any good we ought to have the credit of it. The gentleman said that he originated the idea. The gentleman says that he created this Bureau of Corporations. Let us see about that. Mr. Chairman, the first bill introduced in this Congress providing for a Department of Commerce containing a provision for a Bureau of Corporations was introduced by me on the 2d day of May, 1902. The provision for the Bureau of Corporations in that bill is section No. 5, and I will put that section in my speech to-day, so that he who runs may read.

The section referred to is as follows:

Section 5, of a bill introduced by Mr. SULZER, of New York, on May 2, 1902, entitled "An act to create a Department of Commerce:"

That there shall be established in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau called the "Bureau of Corporations," and a chief of said bureau, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum. There shall also be in said bureau one chief clerk and one auditor and such number of examiners as shall be needed to carry out the purposes of this act. Said auditor and examiners shall be expert accountants, and shall be paid salary and necessary expenses. There shall also be such other clerical assistants as may from time to time be authorized by Congress. It shall be the province and duty of said Bureau of Corporations, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to inspect and examine all corporations engaged in interstate and foreign commerce by gathering, compiling, publishing, and supplying all available and useful information concerning such corporations, including the manner in which their business is conducted, and by such other methods and means as may be prescribed by the said Secretary.

Every corporation governed by this act shall make annual reports in writing to the said auditor of said bureau, and such report shall in all cases include:

(a) Capital authorized and issued, the amount paid up in cash or otherwise, with a statement of the method of paying where it is not in cash.

(b) Debts, including details as to the amount thereof and security given therefor, if any.

(c) Obligations due from officers, which shall be separately stated.

(d) A statement of assets and the method of valuing the same, whether at cost price, by appraisal, or otherwise, and of the allowance made for depreciation. Small items of personal property included in a plant may be described by the term "sundries" or like general term.

(e) Gross earnings for the period covered by the report, all deductions necessary for interest, taxes, and expense of all sorts, the surplus available for dividends, and dividends actually declared.

(f) Increase of assets since the last statement, with a showing in what way such increase has been secured.

(g) The names and addresses of stockholders, with the number of shares held by each at the date of the report.

(h) The amount of stock disposed of and the amount of property taken for stock sold since the last report, with all facts necessary to show the results of the transaction.

(i) A statement showing that the corporation in question has not, during the period covered by the said report, received any rebates, drawbacks, special rates or discriminations, advantages, or preferences, by money payments or otherwise, from any railroad, pipe line, water carrier, or other transportation company, or if any such have been received or given, stating when, from whom, on what account, and in what manner they were so received, with all other details necessary to a full understanding of the transaction or transactions.

(j) The names and addresses of all officers; location of transfer or registry offices, wherever located.

(k) A statement that the corporation has not fixed prices or done any other act with a view to restricting trade or driving any competitor out of business.

(l) A statement that the corporation is or is not a party to any contract, combination, or conspiracy in the form of trust or otherwise in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or Territories or with foreign nations.

(m) A statement of the proportion of goods going into interstate commerce.

That it shall be the duty of the auditor to prescribe the form of the reports before mentioned. He may in his discretion require additional reports at any time when he may see fit, upon reasonable notice; but his determination shall be prima facie proof that the notice is reasonable. He may also require supplemental reports whenever, in his judgment, the report rendered is in any particular or particulars insufficient, evasive, or ambiguous. He may prescribe rules so as to avoid undue detail in making reports, but no detail of the business of the corporation shall be considered private so as to be exempt from the examination of the auditor whenever he may demand report thereon. He shall make public in his reports, which shall be issued annually, all the information contained in the reports so made to him. When a report has been made by a corporation, and, with all supplemental and additional reports required by the auditor, shall have been approved by him, the corporation making such report or reports shall publish the same in a daily newspaper, after the usual custom in such cases, with the auditor's minutes of approval, and shall file with the auditor proof of such publication by the publisher's certificate.

That if any corporation shall fail to make a report when required, either by the terms of this act or when required by the auditor, as herein provided, said corporation shall be fined not less than 1 per cent or not more than 10 per cent of its last annual gross earnings for each offense. Every day of failure after a written demand has been made by the auditor shall constitute a separate and distinct offense. In case of failure, also, each of the directors of the said corporation shall be ineligible, for the year succeeding the next annual meeting, to hold either directorship or any other office in the said corporation. If such report is false in any material respect, the corporation shall be fined not less than 2 per cent and not more than 20 per cent of its last annual gross earnings, and each false statement in any material matter shall constitute a separate offense. All fines and penalties imposed by this act shall be recovered or enforced in any court of competent jurisdiction.

That it shall be the duty of examiners, under the direction of the Auditor, to make examinations of any corporation governed by this act. Any of said examiners presenting his official credentials shall be furnished by the officers of the corporation every facility for complete and full examination, not only of the books, but of all property, records, or papers of the corporation which may be necessary, in the judgment of the examiner, for a complete knowledge of the affairs of the concern. Such examinations shall not be at fixed periods, but shall be at such times as the Auditor shall fix and without notice. Examiners shall have the power to examine under oath all officers or employees of a corporation, or any other persons having any knowledge of its affairs, and to send for, demand, and inspect books, papers, and any other matter of evidence whatever which is in the possession or control of the said corporation. For the purpose of this act examiners shall have power to require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses under oath and the production of all books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. And in case of disobedience to a subpœna the examiner may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring such attendance.

And any of the circuit courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or other person, to issue an order requiring such corporation or other person to appear before said examiner and produce books and papers, if so ordered, and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding. The auditor shall likewise have all the authority of an examiner in any case wherein he chooses himself to act. No examiner shall be assigned to examine any corporation who is himself interested in the business thereof, or any competing concern, or who has relatives who are so interested.

That it shall be unlawful for an examiner to divulge private business, except by his report to the auditor. But such report, or the substance thereof, shall be opened for public inspection. Each examiner shall follow the rules, regulations, and directions which the auditor may from time to time lay down or communicate to him as to the method of examination, the form of report, the matters to be covered by the said examination, and all matters pertaining to his duties. Said examinations and reports shall always cover, among others, the following questions:

(a) Has the said corporation, during the period covered by the examination and report, received any rebates, drawbacks, special rates, or other discriminations, advantages, or preferences, by money payments or otherwise, from any railroad, pipe line, water carrier, or other transportation company?

(b) If there have been such preferences, when were they received, from whom, on what account, and in what manner, giving all details necessary to a full understanding of the transaction?

(c) Is the said corporation a member of any combination having or intending to secure a monopoly of any commodity other than such monopolies as are legally granted by patent or otherwise?

(d) Has the said corporation any such monopoly, or does it use methods tending to secure such monopoly?

(e) Has it made any contracts or agreements tending to secure any such monopoly to itself or any other concern, whether owned by an individual or individuals, a corporation, or some combination of individuals and corporations?

(f) Is such corporation a party to any contract, agreement, or combination, in the form of a trust or otherwise, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations?

(g) Has the corporation purchased or does it hold the stock of any corporation for the purpose of controlling its management?

Said reports of examiners shall be prima facie true and may be introduced in evidence in all courts to prove the facts therein set forth. Copies certified by the auditor shall be admissible with like effect and under the same circumstances as the original. The word "corporation" wherever used in this act shall be deemed to include associations existing or authorized either by the law of the United States, the laws of any State, or the laws of any foreign country.

Mr. SULZER. That was on the 2d of May, 1902. On the 12th day of December, 1902, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] introduced a bill known as H. R. 16282, a bill to establish the Department of Commerce and Labor, and in his bill he has a little brief section, which I will also place in the RECORD, for the establishment of a Bureau of Corporations. Now, what is the truth about this matter? The truth is after I introduced that bill I went before the committee having the bill in charge, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which the gentleman from Illinois is a member and was a member then. I argued in favor of that bill to create that Department of Commerce and Labor containing a provision for a Bureau of Corporations. The gentleman was present and heard the argument, not only of myself, but of several distinguished gentlemen who came to Washington in that session of Congress and argued in favor of the bill and this provision for the creation of a Bureau of Corporations. That session of Congress passed and the committee took no action on the bill, but at the beginning of the next session of the Fifty-seventh Congress the gentleman from Illinois introduced a bill along similar lines and took this idea of mine for a Bureau of Corporations [laughter] and put it into his bill.

But let me proceed. That is not all. The bill to create the Department of Commerce and Labor was reported to the House by the gentleman from Iowa, and was called up by him on January 17, 1903. When the bill was being considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the 17th day of January, 1903, it appeared that that bill——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I can not yield. You would not give me five minutes yesterday when you had lots of time. Now, do not try to steal my time like you stole my ideas. [Laughter].

Mr. MANN. If I did not steal any more of your time than I stole of your ideas——

Mr. SULZER. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is not to come out of my time.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, when that bill to create the Department of Commerce and Labor was reported from the committee of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] there was no provision in the bill for the establishment of a Bureau of Corporations—absolutely no provision. And when the bill was being read in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union I offered section 5 of my bill as an amendment to the pending bill, as a new section, and the RECORD of January 17, 1903, reads as follows:

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which I ask the Clerk to read. I propose that it come in as section 6.

* * * * * * *

This is designed to follow section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman offers it as a new section?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, sir.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following amendment proposed by Mr. SULZER:

And then follows the amendment identical with section 5 of my bill, to create the Department of Commerce and Labor. I said after the amendment was read:

Mr. Chairman, regarding this amendment I want to say that on the 2d day of May, 1902, I introduced in this House a bill to establish a Department of Commerce, and the amendment just read is section 5 of that bill. The bill was referred to and considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I appeared before the committee in favor of my bill to establish a Department of Commerce, and so did a number of distinguished gentlemen representing commercial bodies, labor organizations, the American Anti-Trust League, and other associations which are in favor of publicity in regard to the great trusts of the land.

I will put in the balance of what was then said in my speech.

Mr. MANN. Read it.

Mr. SULZER. I have not time now. I will put it in the RECORD all right. It is in the RECORD now, but I will put it in again to refresh your memory.

Now, at that time, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois debated a proposition to create a Bureau of Corporations, and was very much opposed to it. He did not want it done. [Laughter.] And when the question came up in the Committee of the Whole he voted against putting the amendment in the bill. He voted against the Bureau of Corporations, and when the bill was reported to the House, and as it was on its final passage, the then Democratic leader of the House [Mr. Richardson] moved to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions which the Clerk then read. It was the same identical amendment. There was a roll call on my demand on that motion. The RECORD here shows that the gentleman from Illinois voted against it. Every Republican on that side of the House at that time voted against the amendment to create the Bureau of Corporations, and every Democrat on this side of the House voted in favor of it. That appears in the RECORD, on page 929, January 17, 1903.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the bill passed the House without any Bureau of Corporations provided for in it, a provision which I strenuously struggled for for a year. It went to the Senate. When it reached the other body the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Hanna] moved to commit the bill to the committee. It went to his committee. It was reported out of his committee. There was absolutely no debate on the question. He asked for a conference, and the Senate ordered a conference. It came over to the House, and the House agreed to a conference and there was one. In that conference, although this Bureau of Corporations was not before the conference at all, the conferees put into the bill, in violation of the rules of the Senate and in violation of the rules of the House, this provision from my bill to create a Bureau of Corporations. But they left out practically the best of it. They only put in a part. I could not understand it at the time. I do not really understand it to-day, but there was a reason why the conferees on the part of the House and the conferees on the part of the Senate violated the rules of Congress and put that provision for this Bureau of Corporations into that bill.

There was a reason for it, and if I mistake not the reason was that at that time the Standard Oil trust sent to Congress—to various Members of Congress—telegrams that they did not want any more antitrust legislation. These telegrams, in some way or other, got to the White House, and they were given out from the White House, and they created a revulsion of public feeling all over this country. So that the conferees, one of whom, I think, was the gentleman from Illinois, got worried, got frightened, got scared. I am informed—I do not know whether it is true or not, but I hope it is true—I am informed the far-seeing President of the United States, with his usual political acumen, sent for these conferees and told them, "You made a great mistake when you beat SULZER's amendment for the Bureau of Corporations." [Great laughter.] "If that were law, we could investigate the trusts and find out the truth; if that were law, we could get publicity, and publicity is what the people want to-day. I tell you, gentlemen, go back to Congress and put that Sulzer amendment into the bill." And they came back and they put it partially in the bill. Now, what did the President say about it afterwards, when he wrote his letter of acceptance as candidate for President in 1904? He said:

The action of the last Congress in enlarging the scope of the interstate-commerce law and in creating the Department of Commerce and Labor, with a Bureau of Corporations, have for the first time opened a chance for the National Government to deal intelligently and adequately with the questions affecting society, whether for good or for evil, because of the accumulation of capital in great corporations and because of the new relations caused thereby.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Chairman, that is what the President said. I substantially agree with him. [Great laughter.] I think I have made it clear that the gentleman from Illinois was not the author of the Bureau of Corporations, did not originate the idea, and instead of doing anything to help create it, he was against it whenever he got an opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. One moment. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for one moment.

Mr. SULZER. I am glad to enlighten the gentleman from Illinois about this matter, although I think his memory serves him pretty good, and I think he thought somebody else's memory did not serve him quite as well, and that is the reason he made the speech he made yesterday. I want to be charitable to the gentleman from Illinois. I do not want to be cruel. If I wanted to be real mean and cruel I could be; but it seems to me when a Democrat has been working as hard and as long in the minority as I have, when he has really accomplished something good, something that a Republican President commends, it is the quintessence of partisan meanness for a Republican to endeavor to take it away from him. [Great laughter.]

The provisions referred to are as follows (see p. 977, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 1903):

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which I ask the Clerk to read. I propose that it come in as section 6.

* * * * * * *

This is designed to follow section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman offers it as a new section?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, sir.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following amendment proposed by Mr. SULZER:

SEC. 5. That there shall be in the Department of Commerce a bureau to be called the Bureau of Corporations, and a chief of said Bureau, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive a salary of four thousand dollars per annum. There shall also be in said Bureau one chief clerk and one auditor and such number of examiners as may be needed to carry out the purposes of this Act; said auditor and examiners shall be expert accountants and shall be paid salary and necessary expenses. There shall also be such other clerical assistants as may from time to time be authorized by Congress. It shall be the province and duty of said Bureau of Corporations, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, to inspect, examine, and regulate all corporations engaged in interstate or foreign commerce by gathering, compiling, publishing, and supplying all available and useful information concerning such corporations, including the manner in which their business is conducted, and by such other methods and means as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce or provided by law.

Every corporation governed by this Act shall make annual reports in writing to the Auditor, and such report shall in all cases include:

(a) Capital authorized and issued, the amount paid up in cash or otherwise, with a statement of the method of payment where it is not in cash.

(b) Debts, including details as to the amount thereof, and security given therefor, if any.

(c) Obligations due from officers, which shall be separately stated.

(d) A statement of assets and the method of valuing the same, whether at cost price, by appraisal, or otherwise, and of the allowance made for depreciation. Small items of personal property included in a plant may be described by the term "sundries" or like general term.

(e) Gross earnings for the period covered by the report, all deductions necessary for interest, taxes, and expenses of all sorts, the surplus available for dividends, and dividends actually declared.

(f) Increase of assets since the last statement, with a showing in what way such increase has been secured.

(g) The names and addresses of stockholders, with the number of shares held by each at the date of the report.

(h) The amount of stock disposed of and the amount of property taken for stock sold since the last report, with all facts necessary to show the result of the transaction.

(i) A statement showing that the corporation in question has not, during the period covered by the said report, received any rebates, drawbacks, special rates, or other discriminations, advantages, or preferences by money payments or otherwise from any railroad, pipe line, water carrier, or other transportation company, or if any such have been received or given, stating when, from whom, on what account, and in what manner they were so received, with all other details necessary to a full understanding of the transaction or transactions.

(j) The names and addresses of all offices, location of transfer or registry offices wherever located.

(k) A statement that the corporation has not fixed prices or done any other act with a view of restricting trade or driving any competitor out of business.

(l) A statement that the corporation is or is not a party to any contract, combination, or conspiracy in the form of trust or otherwise, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or Territories or with foreign nations.

(m) A statement of the proportion of goods going into interstate commerce.

It shall be the duty of the Auditor to prescribe the form of the reports before mentioned. He may in his discretion require additional reports at any time when he may see fit upon reasonable notice. But his determination shall be prima facie proof that the notice given is reasonable.

He may also require supplemental reports whenever, in his judgment, the report rendered is, in any particular or particulars, insufficient, evasive, or ambiguous.

He may prescribe rules so as to avoid undue detail in making reports, but no detail of the business of the corporation shall be considered private so as to be exempt from the examination of the Auditor, whenever he may demand report thereon.

He shall make public in his reports, which shall be issued annually, all the information contained in the reports so made to him. When a report has been made by a corporation, and, with all supplemental and additional reports required by the Auditor, shall have been approved by him, the corporation making such report or reports shall publish the same in some newspaper or newspapers, after the usual custom in such cases, with the Auditor's minute of approval, and shall file with the Auditor proof of such publication by the publishers' certificate.

If any corporation shall fail to make a report when required, either by the terms of this Act or when required by the Auditor, as herein provided, said corporation shall be fined not less than one per centum or not more than ten per centum of its last annual gross earnings for each offense. Every day of failure after a written demand has been made by the Auditor shall continue a separate and distinct offense. In case of failure, also, each of the directors of the said corporation shall be ineligible, for the year succeeding the next annual meeting, to hold either directorship or any other office in the said corporation; but any director shall be exempt from said penalty upon making a showing that he has individually made such a report as he was able from the facts at his disposal.

If such report is false in any material respect, the corporation shall be fined not less than two per centum and not more than twenty per centum of its last annual gross earnings, and each false statement in any material matter shall constitute a separate offense. All fines and penalties imposed by this Act shall be recovered or enforced in any court of competent jurisdiction.

It shall be the duty of examiners, under the direction of the Auditor, to make examinations of any corporation governed by this Act.

Any of said examiners presenting his official credentials shall be furnished by the officers of the corporation every facility for complete and full examination, not only of the books, but of all the property, record, or papers of the corporation, which may be necessary, in the judgment of the examiner, for a complete knowledge of the affairs of the concern.

Such examinations shall not be at fixed periods, but shall be at such times as the auditor shall fix and without notice.

Examiners shall have the power to examine under oath all officers or employees of a corporation, or any other persons having any knowledge of its affairs, and to send for, demand, and inspect books, papers, and any other matter of evidence whatever which is in the possession or control of the said corporation.

For the purpose of this Act examiners shall have power to require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and other production of all books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation.

Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. And in case of disobedience to a subpœna the examiner may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance.

And any of the circuit courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any corporation subject to the provisions of this Act, or other person, issue an order requiring such corporation or other person to appear before said examiner (and produce books and papers if so ordered) and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

The auditor shall likewise have all the authority of an examiner in any case wherein he chooses himself to act.

No examiner shall be assigned to examine any corporation who is himself interested in the business thereof, or of any competing concern, or who has relatives who are so interested.

Any blackmailing or receiving of bribes by any examiner or by the auditor shall be duly punished.

It shall be unlawful for an examiner to divulge private business, except by his report to the auditor. But such report, or the substance thereof, shall be open to public inspection.

Each examiner shall follow the rules, regulations, and directions which the auditor may from time to time lay down or communicate to him as to the method of examination, the form of report, the matters to be covered by the said examination, and all matters pertaining to his duties.

Said examinations and reports shall always cover, among others, the following questions:

(a) Has the said corporation, during the period covered by the examination and report, received any rebates, drawbacks, special rates, or other discriminations, advantages, or preferences, by money payments or otherwise, from any railroad, pipe line, water carrier, or other transportation company?

(b) If there have been such preferences, when were they received, from whom, on what account, and in what manner, giving all details necessary to a full understanding of the transaction?

(c) Is the said corporation a member of any combination having or intending to secure a monopoly of any commodity other than such monopolies as are legally granted by patent or otherwise?

(d) Has the said corporation any such monopoly, or does it use methods tending to secure such monopoly?

(e) Has it made any contracts or agreements tending to secure any such monopoly to itself or any other concern, whether owned by an individual or individuals, a corporation, or some combination of individuals and corporations?

(f) Is such corporation a party to any contract, agreement, combination, or conspiracy, in the form of a trust or otherwise, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations?

(g) Has the corporation purchased or does it hold the stock of any other corporation for the purpose of controlling its management?

Said reports of examiners shall be prima facie true and may be introduced in evidence in all courts to prove the facts therein set forth. Copies certified by the auditor shall be admissible with like effect and under the same circumstances as the original.

The word "corporation" wherever used in this Act shall be deemed to include associations existing or authorized by the law of either the United States, the laws of any State, or the laws of any foreign country.

The amendment is identical with section 5 of my bill, to create the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, regarding this amendment I want to say that on the 2d day of May, 1902, I introduced in this House a bill to establish a department of commerce, and the amendment just read is section 5 of that bill. The bill was referred to and considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I appeared before that committee in favor of my bill to establish a Department of Commerce, and so did a number of distinguished gentlemen representing commercial bodies, labor organizations, the American Anti-Trust League, and other associations which are in favor of publicity in regard to the great trusts of our land.

All of these gentlemen advocated my bill or the incorporation in the Department of Commerce bill of a provision similar to the amendment just offered by me. The committee did not see fit to do that. They left it out of the bill they reported and now before the House.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to state briefly that this amendment brings before the House, as clearly and as positively as any proposition can, the question of whether the Members of this House are in favor of publicity regarding the trusts or not. If we are sincerely in favor of publicity regarding the trusts, we can not, it seems to me, object to this amendment. If we want publicity, we can not object to the establishment of this Bureau of Corporations in the Department of Commerce and Labor, for it is something which will create publicity and secure the information the Attorney-General says he wants in order to enforce the antitrust laws.

In my opinion it is the best plan for publicity yet devised, and will secure the information that every citizen wants regarding the conduct and the management of the great trusts of our country, and go far, in my judgment, to prevent the trusts from violating or evading the law now on the statute books against trusts and monopolies. It has been stated by those more competent to judge perhaps than myself that if this amendment were a law no trust in this country, no corporation, no monopoly, would or could violate the law.

Besides, it would secure all the information desired, and if the laws were violated the Attorney-General would have officially the facts to proceed forthwith and punish such violations. It would prevent the excuse now offered by the Department of Justice.

I think this amendment ought to be adopted. It will be if those who oppose trusts and monopolies and want publicity regarding them, so that the truth shall be known, vote for it. So I offered this amendment to find out and have the country know the names of the Members who are sincerely in favor of publicity and who are not. Let the record tell. Now is the time to stand by your professions and live up to your promises. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the report of the bill from the committee provides for a Bureau of Corporations for the very purpose of providing an executive agency on publicity. Probably this side of the House would not always feel disposed to accept the language arranged by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] in reference to the method of obtaining publicity.

Very likely the other side of the House will accept the leadership of the gentleman from New York on this question. If so, we shall be content, but the committee which reported the bill has been rather inclined to await the report of the gentlemen from the Judiciary Committee, from both sides of the House, who are engaged in endeavoring to find a proper solution of the method of publicity. There is no disposition on the part of the committee which reported the bill, no disposition on the part of this House, to refuse proper legislation to effect publicity, but, with all due respect to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], I trust that we may be forgiven if we do not always adopt his views upon this subject.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. The section to which the gentleman refers as creating this Bureau of Corporations, I take it, is section 7?

Mr. MANN. Section 7.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I would ask the gentleman's construction as to what powers such a Bureau would have? I have read the section hastily, and it seemed to me that it did not give the Bureau very much, if any, power to get the information.

Mr. SULZER. That is quite true.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt whatever, Mr. Chairman, that section 7, as it reads in the bill, will not confer upon the Bureau of Corporations the power to compel the giving of information, and in that respect it might be said to be defective, and clearly would be defective if it were not the purpose to follow it up with additional legislation; but we all know that the Members of this House and the Members of this Congress are proposing to have additional legislation, and if this bill becomes a law and this Bureau of Corporations is created, undoubtedly there will be conferred either upon the Bureau itself or upon the Department the necessary powers to carry out the idea for which the Bureau is created.

If it is the preference of the House to take the suggestions—admirable in their nature, but more or less crude in the drawing of the language—of the gentleman from New York, very good; but I should prefer that the House should have the information which comes from the distinguished Judiciary Committee of this House, which intends, as I understand, to report some kind of a bill to the House covering ground like this.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, yes; they will doubtless report a bill some time, somehow, some way, and too late in the closing days of this session of Congress ever to pass before we adjourn. You may pass some kind of a bill through the House only to die in the Senate. It is the old, old story.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting in this House for three years to see what action would be taken that would amount to anything to clip the wings of the trusts, and it is immaterial to me whom I am following if the road is clear, whether it be the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I am here to help do something to curtail the increasing power of the trusts, and it is immaterial to me who leads in this, to my mind, good work.

Here is an amendment which proposes some practical legislation to make public the acts and doings of the great trusts and combines of this country, and the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. MANN] fails entirely to point out in this amendment anything which he thinks even is obnoxious, or is not in accordance with his views. He simply wishes to put off the matter to a more convenient time. It is the same old plea. We have been told, from the President of the United States down, that something should be done to make public the conduct of the trusts. Publicity is the great question which the public is demanding to-day of those corporations. Now, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] can not find any fault with this amendment, if he is simply waiting for something better, why not point out what is wrong in this bill, which is specific, directing, and comprehensive? We are confronted with the proposition now whether we shall do something or continue to do nothing, as we have for the last three years. Let us not dodge or evade our responsibility. The country is looking and waiting to see if we will keep our promises and do something to give publicity to the working of the trusts.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will pardon me for saying that while it possibly is negligence on my part, I never have read the proposition of the gentleman from New York. It may be heavenly for aught I know. It may be perfect; but I should prefer to have it presented to the House in such a way that it can be properly considered by the committee.

Mr. THAYER. Unless the gentleman from Illinois is deaf, he must have heard the reading of it, line by line and word by word, within the last ten minutes.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not as smart as the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he can understand it from hearing it read.

Mr. THAYER. I hope the opportunity will be granted for gentlemen of this House to discuss and analyze this amendment. I think it comes nearer to the bull's-eye than anything that has been presented. I had occasion to vote with the majority of this House for a constitutional amendment in the last Congress which it was never intended should be passed by the coordinate branch at the other end of this building and which I had very grave doubts about our right to pass; but I want to do something while I am a Member of this House or help others in doing something that will make public the acts of the trusts, a proposition which all parties agree is needed, and something that will in some measure satisfy the public. This amendment provides for the very thing we have been discussing here for the last four years. The opportunity is now here. Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation for those who do not believe in permitting these trusts to go on in the way they have been going.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just a few words more. In discussing this amendment after it was offered the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said it was crude. That is the word I believe he used. Subsequently, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER], the gentleman from Illinois said he never read the amendment, that he had not heard it read, that he knew nothing whatever about it. It seems to me, sir, it comes with very bad grace for the gentleman from Illinois to characterize an amendment as crude that he has never read and never heard read. But it is characteristic of the gentleman, and shows how much reliance should be given his speech.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, this amendment has been pending before his committee ever since the 2d day of last May. And further, sir, he was present in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce when a delegation of the distinguished and representative gentlemen with myself went before his committee and urged a favorable report on my bill, or at least the incorporation of this amendment, being section 5 in my bill, in a bill creating a Department of Commerce. He heard every word of that discussion. He asked questions of the gentlemen on that occasion. That discussion is printed. Any Member can get a copy of it. It is a part of the records of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on this bill.

It is too late for him now to say that he never read, or heard read, the amendment. In my opinion, he knows all about it, or he would not now oppose it so tenaciously. But if he says it is crude, let me say to him it has been submitted to some of the greatest lawyers in all this land—lawyers not employed by the trusts—and to men who have studied this trust question, not in the interest of the trusts, but in the interests of all the people, and they have all approved it. They say it will absolutely establish publicity, and do it in the only logical and legal way.

Again, sir, this amendment has been favorably passed on by the labor organizations, by the American Anti-Trust League, by leading thinkers and political economists, and by the honest folk of the land who are earnestly and honestly and fearlessly opposed to trusts and monopolies. The independent press of the country ask for publicity. In editorial after editorial they favor this amendment. The President asks for publicity. The Democrats ask for publicity and will vote to a man for this amendment. The people of the land, from one end of it to the other, demand publicity. The Republicans—that is, a few Republicans—say they want publicity; they say it, but they are afraid to vote for publicity. [Applause.]

The Republicans say they are going to give the people publicity as to the trusts some time, some way, somehow; but the days are going on. This Congress will adjourn on the 4th of next March. The time, gentlemen, is short, and I undertake to say that if this amendment is not adopted now, if it is not put in this bill and kept there, that there will be no antitrust legislation, no law for publicity passed during this session of Congress. The President, the Attorney-General, and all of the distinguished Republicans, including my friend from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], will keep on talking against the trusts, but they will do nothing against them.

The people will not and can not be deceived much longer in this matter. The record here to-day on this amendment will tell the tale. It will show whether the Republicans or the Democrats are sincere. It will tell the world who is for and who is against publicity—who are the friends of the trusts and who are the enemies of monopoly. An ounce of performance is worth a ton of promise. If gentlemen on the other side are sincerely in favor of what the people want, if they favor publicity, you will give the people this ounce of performance to-day, and in my judgment it will truly establish publicity and go far to do away with trust evils.

With publicity—like a searchlight, exposing to public view every violation of law—the trusts and monopolies would hesitate a long time ere they violated the law; and if the Attorney-General promptly enforced the law against them, violations of law would soon cease entirely. But the Attorney-General says substantially in his Pittsburg speech that he can not enforce the law against the trusts because he can not get the evidence of violations of law. Make this amendment a law as a part of this bill, and the Attorney-General will have no difficulty in getting the facts—the evidence—to successfully prosecute every trust that is violating the law.

The law now on the statute books against trusts is clear and plain, and the highest court in the land has passed on its validity and sustained the constitutionality of its provisions. The antitrust act of 1890 declares that every contract or combination in the nature of a trust in restraint of trade and commerce among the several States and Territories or with foreign nations is a conspiracy, illegal and void, and punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Under this antitrust act it seems to me every trust in the United States can be prosecuted for violation of law, the charter annulled, and the men behind it punished for conspiracy. Every trust by its very nature is in restraint of trade and commerce and in violation of this law.

If you will read the antitrust act of 1890 and the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the trans-Missouri freight case and the Addyston Pipe Line case, the conclusion will be irresistible to the logical mind that the fault is not so much with the law as it is with the men who are sworn to enforce the law.

In my opinion—and I say so advisedly—the Department of Justice under the present law can institute and successfully maintain actions against every trust doing business in the United States. The law is clear and plain, and the facts are within the knowledge of all.

Now, adopt this amendment offered by me for publicity regarding the trusts and monopolies, make it a part of this bill, so that it will soon be a law, and the Attorney-General will get all the facts he wants, and official facts that will be evidence sufficient to prosecute and sufficient to win every case against every trust violating the law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 88.

Mr. SULZER. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 90.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I desire now to say one thing. All the Republicans voted against this amendment for publicity and all the Democrats voted for it. That tells the story and the whole story. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit the bill with instructions, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That the pending bill be recommitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with instructions to report a bill or bills to the House to create and establish two separate departments, a department of labor and a department of commerce, each of the same dignity as existing departments and each with a secretary in the Cabinet of the President, and to assign to each of the departments proper and relative bureaus; with instructions also to strike out section 7 of the bill and insert the following as section 7:

"SEC. 7. That there shall be established in the department of commerce a bureau to be called the bureau of corporations, and a chief of said bureau, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum. There shall also be in said bureau one chief clerk and one auditor and such number of examiners as shall be needed to carry out the purposes of this act. Said auditor and examiners shall be expert accountants, and shall be paid salary and necessary expenses. There shall also be such other clerical assistants as may from time to time be authorized by Congress. It shall be the province and duty of said bureau of corporations, under the direction of the secretary of commerce, to inspect and examine all corporations engaged in interstate or foreign commerce by gathering, compiling, publishing, and supplying all available and useful information concerning such corporations, including the manner in which their business is conducted, and by such other methods and means as may be prescribed by the secretary.

"Every corporation governed by this act shall make annual reports in writing to the said auditor of said Bureau, and such report shall in all cases include—

"(a) Capital authorized and issued; the amount paid up in cash or otherwise, with a statement of the method of paying where it is not in cash.

"(b) Debts, including details as to the amount thereof and security given therefor, if any.

"(c) Obligations due from officers, which shall be separately stated.

"(d) A statement of assets and the method of valuing the same, whether at cost price, by appraisal, or otherwise, and of the allowance made for depreciation. Small items of personal property included in a plant may be described by the term "sundries" or like general term.

"(e) Gross earnings for the period covered by the report, all deductions necessary for interest, taxes, and expense of all sorts, the surplus available for dividends, and dividends actually declared.

"(f) Increase of assets since the last statement, with a showing in what way such increase has been secured.

"(g) The names and addresses of stockholders, with the number of shares held by each at the date of the report.

"(h) The amount of stock disposed of and the amount of property taken for stock sold since the last report, with all facts necessary to show the results of the transaction.

"(i) A statement showing that the corporation in question has not, during the period covered by the said report, received any rebates, drawbacks, special rates or discriminations, advantages or preferences, by money payments or otherwise, from any railroad, pipe line, water carrier, or other transportation company, or if any such have been received or given, stating when, from whom, on what account, and in what manner they were so received, with all other details necessary to a full understanding of the transaction or transactions.

"(j) The names and addresses of all officers; location of transfer or registry offices, wherever located.

"(k) A statement that the corporation has not fixed prices, or done any other act with a view to restricting trade or driving any competitor out of business.

"(l) A statement that the corporation is or is not a party to any contract, combination, or conspiracy in the form of trust or otherwise in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or Territories or with foreign nations.

"(m) A statement of the proportion of goods going into interstate commerce.

"That it shall be the duty of the auditor to prescribe the form of the reports before mentioned. He may in his discretion require additional reports at any time when he may see fit, upon reasonable notice; but his determination shall be prima facie proof that the notice is reasonable. He may also require supplemental reports whenever, in his judgment, the report rendered is in any particular or particulars insufficient, evasive, or ambiguous. He may prescribe rules so as to avoid undue detail in making reports, but no detail of the business of the corporation shall be considered private so as to be exempt from the examination of the auditor whenever he may demand report thereon. He shall make public in his reports, which shall be issued annually, all the information contained in the reports so made to him. When a report has been made by a corporation, and, with all supplemental and additional reports required by the auditor, shall have been approved by him, the corporation making such report or reports shall publish the same in a daily newspaper, after the usual custom in such cases, with the auditor's minutes of approval, and shall file with the auditor proof of such publication by the publisher's certificate.

"That if any corporation shall fail to make a report when required, either by the terms of this act or when required by the auditor, as herein provided, said corporation shall be fined not less than 1 per cent or not more than 10 per cent of its last annual gross earnings for each offense. Every day of failure after a written demand has been made by the auditor shall constitute a separate and distinct offense. In case of failure, also, each of the directors of the said corporation shall be ineligible, for the year succeeding the next annual meeting, to hold either directorship or any other office in the said corporation. If such report is false in any material respect, the corporation shall be fined not less than 2 per cent and not more than 20 per cent of its last annual gross earnings, and each false statement in any material matter shall constitute a separate offense. All fines and penalties imposed by this act shall be recovered or enforced in any court of competent jurisdiction.

"That it shall be the duty of examiners, under the direction of the auditor, to make examinations of any corporation governed by this act. Any of said examiners presenting his official credentials shall be furnished by the officers of the corporation every facility for complete and full examination, not only of the books, but of all property, records, or papers of the corporation which may be necessary, in the judgment of the examiner, for a complete knowledge of the affairs of the concern. Such examinations shall not be at fixed periods, but shall be at such times as the auditor shall fix and without notice. Examiners shall have the power to examine under oath all officers or employees of a corporation, or any other persons having any knowledge of its affairs, and to send for, demand, and inspect books, papers, and any other matter of evidence whatever which is in the possession or control of the said corporation. For the purpose of this act examiners shall have power to require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses under oath and the production of all books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation.

"Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. And in case of disobedience to a subpœna the examiner may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring such attendance. And any of the circuit courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or other person, issue an order requiring such corporation or other person to appear before said examiner and produce books and papers, if so ordered, and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding. The auditor shall likewise have all the authority of an examiner in any case wherein he chooses himself to act. No examiner shall be assigned to examine any corporation who is himself interested in the business thereof, or any competing concern, or who has relatives who are so interested.

"That it shall be unlawful for an examiner to divulge private business, except by his report to the auditor. But such report, or the substance thereof, shall be opened for public inspection. "Said reports of examiners shall be prima facie true and may be introduced in evidence in all courts to prove the facts therein set forth. Copies certified by the auditor shall be admissible with like effect and under the same circumstances as the original. The word 'corporation' wherever used in this act shall be deemed to include associations existing or authorized either by the law of the United States, the laws of any State, or the laws of any foreign country."

Mr. OVERSTREET (before the reading of the amendment was concluded). Mr. Speaker, this amendment has already been read to the House, when offered by the gentleman from New York. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. I make this point of order against the motion to recommit, that it directs the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to report a bill creating a department of labor, which, under the rules of the House, can not be done by this committee. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has not jurisdiction, and could not have jurisdiction, of a bill to organize a department of labor.

Mr. PAYNE. And besides it is not germane.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], if he has concluded his statement——

Mr. MANN. I make the further point that a bill to create a Department of Labor is not germane as an amendment to the bill pending before the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In reply to the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois, I desire only to say that it is competent for the House of Representatives to refer a bill to any committee that it may choose. A particular committee might not have jurisdiction in the first place without the direct action of the House. A bill might inadvertently be referred to a committee not having jurisdiction of the subject under the rules the bill would not go there. But it is competent for the House in its majesty, as the House sits here this evening, to refer this or any other bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is very clearly of opinion that the view expressed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] as to the power of the House to refer this matter to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce states correctly the situation. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on the other proposition—that the motion is not germane.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A provision for the establishment of a department of labor was part of the original bill.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I put an interrogatory to the gentleman from Illinois? I want to ask him this question: If this proposition is not germane, how was it that it was contained originally in this bill? There is nothing embraced in the motion to recommit that is not already contained in some form in the bill as reported.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, it may be beyond the comprehension of some people—it certainly is not beyond the lucid comprehension of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]—that a certain provision which may be in a bill may come properly before a committee which has jurisdiction of the whole subject-matter of the bill, while it would not have jurisdiction of another proposition, because that other proposition would not be germane.

Here is a proposition to create two departments. On the same theory on which this proposition is defended this motion might be a direction to the committee to provide for the creation of a department of mines and mining, and a department of transportation, and a department of interstate and foreign commerce, and forty other departments of the Government.

Now, it does not seem to me (although I do not care to detain the House upon the question) that the proposition is germane to the bill before the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The original bill was a proposition to establish a department of commerce and labor. The motion to recommit proposes simply to have two separate departments instead of one. The motion is just as germane as anything could be.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no question in the mind of the Chair as to the power of the House to authorize the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to report a bill creating a department of labor, if the House sees fit to refer that subject to that committee. This is a bill creating a department of commerce and labor. The proposition contained in the motion is to return this bill to that committee with instructions to separate the two branches of the subject, and to report instead of a measure for one department a measure for two departments, covering the same subjects as are now covered in the bill pending before the House. The Chair holds that the motion is germane. The point of order is therefore overruled. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] to recommit the bill with instructions, as read by the Clerk.

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The noes seem to have it.

Mr. SULZER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 86, nays 116, answered "present" 13, not voting 138, as follows:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, sometimes some Member of the House is kind enough to come to me and say "How did you happen to be informed upon that question?" And I have refused to make answer. I thought it was a secret of mine. But I am willing to disclose that secret now. All the things that I have ever happened to know on any matter in the House I learned from the distinguished gentleman from New York. [Laughter.] I have great honor for him. I have been in favor of his selection as the leader of the minority; I have been in favor of his nomination for governor of New York; I am now willing to bow to the judgment of the people and urge his selection as the Democratic candidate for President or Vice-President of the United States [laughter and applause], and I am going to charge gentlemen on the Democratic side that if in their wisdom they shall select the gentleman from New York they will do credit to themselves and give great opportunities to the Republicans to pour hot shot into their nominee. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New York says that the Department of Commerce and Labor bill was reported to the House by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. He is substantially correct, except I reported the Department of Commerce and Labor bill into the House——

Mr. SULZER. That makes it worse.

Mr. MANN. By direction of the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

That bill, when reported into the House, contained section 6, providing for a Bureau of Corporations.

Mr. SULZER. No; it did not. That section 6 provided for a Bureau of Manufactures.

Mr. MANN. The trouble is that the gentleman is not informed. Section 6, as it passed the House, provided for the Bureau of Corporations. The gentleman stated that it was inserted in the bill in conference contrary to the rules of the House and the Senate. The bill, which became a law, was introduced into the Senate in December, I think, 1901. It was reported by Senator NELSON into the Senate on January 2, 1902.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman be kind enough to read in the bill, which he reported to the House, any provision for a Bureau of Corporations, in section 6? I have it right here. Read it.

Mr. MANN. I ask the gentleman to take his seat. I am doing this talking.

Mr. SULZER. Let us be honest. Read the section.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I demand order.

Mr. MANN. I will read the section.

Mr. SULZER. I have it right here. I will send it to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor and declines to be interrupted.

Mr. SULZER. The RECORD speaks for itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York must not interrupt the gentleman from Illinois without his permission.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course I know it was said here this morning that the wind rose in Manila with the sun, and the gentleman is much like Manila. [Laughter.] The bill came over from the Senate to the House in January, 1902. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce held hearings on that bill and upon other House bills, not including the bill offered by the gentleman from New York, during March and April, 1902. At the time of those hearings an amendment was substantially drawn creating the Bureau of Corporations. I do not know where the gentleman got his section that he introduced in May, but I presume he gathered it up as it came from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at the time, as it was then in typewriting and submitted to members of that committee. He introduced a bill in May, 1902. He says he had hearings before that committee. I will not deny it.

I hold in my hand all the printed hearings of that committee upon the subject. There is no hearing from the gentleman from New York in the printed volume, but that is no sign he was not heard; because that committee very often does not print hearings unless it takes them seriously, and that committee never takes the gentleman from New York seriously. [Laughter.] But by direction of the committee in December I introduced the bill that the gentleman has referred to, for the purpose only of having the bill in print for the benefit of the committee. The committee was considering the Senate bill. It had prepared the bill which I introduced, a very common practice. On January 6, 1903, I reported the Senate bill back to the House. The report was drawn and considered during the holidays. Section 6 of the bill as reported back in the House contained a Bureau of Insurance, which afterwards went out, so that the sections in the bill were advanced one number. Section 7 of that bill as reported into the House on January 6, 1903, Senate bill 569. report No. 2970, contained this provision:

SEC. 7. That there shall be in the Department of Commerce and Labor a Bureau to be called the Bureau of Corporations, and the Chief of said Bureau shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum. There shall also be in said Bureau such clerks and assistants as may from time to time be authorized by law—

And various other provisions upon the same subject. The gentleman stated that there was no such section in the bill as reported to the House. The gentleman can put his word against mine if he pleases, but there is the bill, and it speaks for itself. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now, what took place when the bill was reached for consideration in the House? The gentleman offered an amendment, and I said to the House:

Mr. Chairman, the report of the bill from the committee provides for a Bureau of Corporations, for the very purpose of providing an Executive agency of publicity.

The matter was considerably discussed. The gentleman offered his amendment and had it read, an amendment occupying nearly a column and a half in the RECORD.

Of course nobody listened to its reading except the gentleman from New York, and the gentleman from New York then said:

All of these gentlemen—

Referring to the hearings before the committee—advocated my bill or the incorporation in the Department of Commerce bill of a provision similar to the amendment just offered by me. The committee did not see fit to do that. They left it out of the bill they reported and now before the House.

The amendment reported by the committee then contained the Bureau of Corporations. I dare say that no member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at that time knew that the gentleman from New York had ever heard of creating a Bureau of Corporations. The gentleman may have appeared before the committee. I do not deny it. I do not remember it. I make no effort to remember any of the appearances of the gentleman before the committee. But the item was in the bill, and the section was in the bill when it was reported into the House. I reported it into the House; I drew it with my own hand. When it went into conference it was changed and enlarged. The gentleman can claim all the credit he pleases, but the gentleman from New York had better consult the RECORD before he puts his memory so vigorously against mine. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing in my speech this record that I have referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I will not ask to print this history of the Bureau, for it is a little too large.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendment to the House with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAPRON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19355) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to its final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the last paragraph of the bill and insert: "All materials purchased under the provisions of this act shall be of American manufacture, except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is for the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases in limited quantities abroad, such material purchased in limited quantities to be admitted free of duty, as shall other similar material furnished without charge."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The House is dividing.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the inquiry is in order because it goes to the subject-matter. I would like to have the House know what the words are that are stricken out by the amendment, because that paragraph was in committee amended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows nothing about what took place in committee except the report of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not require such knowledge. I ask to have reported the words for which this is a substitute.

The SPEAKER. It could only be by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

The House then divided; and there were—ayes 131, noes 106.

Mr. SHERLEY. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order now, in order that the House may vote intelligently on the amendment——

Mr. PAYNE. The regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for; the House is dividing and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 121, nays 106, answering "present" 5, not voting 156, as follows:

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 23, 1908.

Rev. ULYSSES G. B. PIERCE, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

*Now we would not have you ignorant concerning them that fall asleep; that ye sorrow not as they that have no hope. For God appointed us not unto wrath, but unto the obtaining of eternal life; that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with Him. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; or whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's. * * **

We beseech you, therefore, touching these things, that ye be not quickly shaken from your mind, nor yet be troubled. For I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels nor principalities nor powers, nor things present nor things to come, nor height nor depth, nor any other creation, shall be able to separate us from the love of God our Father.

Again, our Father, with bowed heads and saddened hearts we come to acknowledge the mystery of Thy Providence and to discover anew that the way of man is not in himself alone; that it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. But though we come to Thee with saddened hearts, we come to Thee with no fear, with no distrust, for Thou hast taught us that though we make our bed in the grave, yet Thou art there.

So for him whom Thou hast called to Thy higher service, our Father, we pray less than for the bereaved family and for ourselves, that something of his kindliness and energy may fall on us, to anoint us anew for Thy service, that Thy kingdom may come, and Thy holy will be done, now and forever more. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. CLAY, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, in the absence of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] it becomes my painful duty to announce to the Senate the death of WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN, the junior Senator from that State.

Mr. BRYAN died in this city at Providence Hospital at 8.30 a. m. yesterday of typhoid fever.

He was appointed by the governor of Florida on December 26 last to fill the unexpired term of the late Senator Mallory, ending March 4, 1909. He took his seat in this body January 9 and attended only a few sessions of the Senate before he was stricken down with typhoid fever, from which disease he never recovered. He was the youngest member of the Senate, not having reached his thirty-second year at the time of his death.

His friends thought he had before him a career of great usefulness. Had his life been spared, doubtless their most sanguine expectations would have been realized. He possessed a charming personality and made friends wherever he went. He was studious, industrious, and ambitious for his country's good. The people of Florida loved and trusted him and he loved them, and Florida to-day mourns his death. This is not the proper time to eulogize his memory.

At some future time and on an occasion appointed for that purpose the senior Senator from Florida will join with other friends of the deceased Senator in paying to his memory that tribute of affection, confidence, and esteem which I know is felt by all.

In order that the Senate may give expression to the feeling which I feel sure is entertained by all his associates, I ask for the immediate consideration and adoption of the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia offers the following resolutions.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM JAMES BRYAN, late a Senator from the State of Florida.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the Vice-President to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. BRYAN.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect his remains be removed from Washington to Jacksonville, Fla., for burial in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Georgia.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed as members of the committee under the second resolution Mr. TALIAFERRO, Mr. DANIEL, Mr. BACON, Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. STONE, and Mr. CARTER.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the additional resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia offers an additional resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Georgia.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to, and the Senate (at 12 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 24, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 23, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., delivered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, whose ways are past finding out, yet in whom we live and move and have our being, strengthen Thou our faith, increase our hopes, and renew our courage that we may go forward to the work Thou hast given us to do. Though our hearts be bowed in sorrow because a young life, full of hopes and promises, has been taken from the Congressional body, help us to realize that our lives are Thine, that Thy will is good will, that no harm can come to us in life or death, for Thou art love.

> That nothing walks with aimless feet,
> That not one life shall be destroyed,
> Or cast as rubbish to the void,
> When God hath made the pile complete.

So comfort, we beseech Thee, those who knew, loved, and admired him. Especially be a solace and comfort to the young wife, and bid her look forward with hope to a bright beyond, in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 21, 1908, was read and approved.

RESIGNATION OF REPRESENTATIVE CHARLES E. LITTLEFIELD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication:

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1908.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

DEAR SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a Member of the Sixtieth Congress from the Second District of Maine, to take effect on and after the 30th day of September, 1908.

I am, sir, with the highest regard,
Your most obedient servant, CHARLES E. LITTLEFIELD.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution which I desire to present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] rises to a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 21, 1908, be corrected by striking out, on pages 3820, 3821, 3822, 3823, 3824, 3825, and 3826, the speech purporting to have been delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], and inserting in lieu thereof the transcript of the notes of the official reporters of the House of the speech actually made, together with the copy of any record referred to in such speech.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss the resolution at any length. I have the transcripts supposed to have been made by the official reporters of the House, corrected, I suppose, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER]. Where they are corrected they show for themselves more changes than there was substance in the original speech.

I desire to call attention to two or three particular parts of the speech as reported in the RECORD, as compared with the speech as delivered in the House. On page 3822 the gentleman is reported by the RECORD to have said:

But, Mr. Chairman, let us proceed. That is not all. Let us continue and confine ourselves to the record of Congress. I want the truth to be known by all men. On January 6, 1903, a bill to create the Department of Commerce and Labor was reported to the House by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and was called up for consideration on January 17, 1903. When the bill was being considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the 17th of January, 1903.

What the gentleman actually said was:

But let me proceed. That is not all. The bill creating the Department of Commerce and Labor was reported to the House by the gentleman from Iowa and was called up by him on January 17, 1903. When the bill was being considered in the Whole House on the state of the Union on the 17th of January, 1903.

On page 3822 the gentleman from New York is reported to have said:

Now, Mr. Chairman, when the bill to create the Bureau of Commerce and Labor was reported from the committee of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] it was not my bill first introduced, nor the bill of the gentleman from Illinois, but there was a small provision in the bill for the establishment of a Bureau of Corporations, and it was as follows. I will read it—

Reading what was then section 7 of the bill:

"SEC. 7. That there shall be in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau, to be called the 'Bureau of Corporations,' and the chief of said bureau shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum.

Then follows the remainder of that section, which I will not read.

Mr. Chairman, it is apparent from the reading of the RECORD that my provision for a Bureau of Corporations was intended to accomplish something for good, but the provision in the bill reported by the committee was a mere sop, and if it had become a law it would have accomplished practically nothing.

What the gentleman really said was:

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, when that bill creating the Department of Commerce and Labor was reported from the committee by the gentleman from Illinois, there was no provision in the bill for the establishment of a Bureau of Corporations—absolutely no provision.

And, again, the gentleman is reported in the RECORD to have said, on page 3826:

And now, Mr. Chairman, it appears that on the final roll call in this House the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and every Republican on that side of the House voted against my proposition to establish a Bureau of Corporations that would really accomplish some good. And I submit that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], or, for that matter, any other Republican in this House, can not now take credit for the creation of this Bureau of Corporations. But let us proceed by the record. After the bill passed the House it went to the Senate and was referred, without debate, to the Senate committee. A few days afterwards it was reported to the Senate and a conference was asked and conference committee appointed, and then the bill came back to the House, and a conference committee was appointed on the part of the House, and the bill then went to conference. In the conference committee the bill was perfected, and the provision for the Bureau of Corporations greatly enlarged, although it did not go as far as my provision. The conferees took out of my provision certain parts of it and ignored the other parts. The parts they took out and incorporated in the bill made the bill very much better.

What the gentleman actually said was:

There was a roll call on my demand. On that motion the RECORD here shows that the gentleman from Illinois voted against it, and every Republican on that side of the House at that time voted against a motion to create the Bureau of Corporations, and every Democrat on this side of this House voted in favor of it.

That appears in the RECORD, on page 929, of January 17, 1903.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the bill passed the House without any Bureau of Corporations provided for in it, a provision which I strenuously struggled for for a year. It went to the Senate. When it reached the other body the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Hanna] moved to commit the bill to the committee. It went to his committee. It was reported out of his committee. There was absolutely no debate on the question. He asked for a conference, and the Senate ordered a conference. It came over to the House, and the House agreed to a conference, and there was one. In that conference, although this Bureau of Corporations was not before the conference at all, the conferees put into the bill, in violation of the rules of the Senate and in violation of the rules of the House, this provision from my bill to create a Bureau of Corporations. But they left out practically the best of it. They only put in a part. I could not understand it at the time. I do not really understand it to-day, but there was a reason why the conferees on the part of the House and the conferees on the part of the Senate violated the rules of Congress and put that provision for this Bureau of Corporations into that bill.

Now, it was that portion of the gentleman's speech which I have read which was the real substance of his speech. He has absolutely changed the record, or some one has, in the speech as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to show that where he said "no" he now says "yea," and where he said "yea" he now says "nay." I do not desire to be captious; I do not believe in beating the air. It is immaterial to me what kind of a speech the gentleman puts into the RECORD, but I do not desire to answer speeches of the gentleman and then find when the speech is printed in the RECORD it is entirely different. The gentleman had unanimous consent. He said:

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing in my speech this record that I have referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The only authority the gentleman from New York had to change his remarks was by inserting the record. But he was not satisfied with making the changes which have been referred to. The gentleman from New York—and I have no disposition to criticise him for that specially—inserted various other remarks in the RECORD, on paper which is practically the paper used by the official reporters, but it was not furnished by the official reporters, and inserted, with that degree of candor which compels admiration, in his own handwriting, in this imaginary speech of his, "Applause on the Democratic side." [Laughter.]

That occurs, Mr. Speaker, more than once, in his own handwriting: "Applause on the Democratic side."

That appears in the imaginary speech, or perhaps a speech delivered by the gentleman to his stenographer. Now I should like to yield the gentleman some time if he desires it.

Mr. SULZER. I will speak in my own time.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman desire any time?

Mr. SULZER. Not from you.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution. If the gentleman desires time, I am perfectly willing to yield to him.

Mr. SULZER. I do not know that the gentleman controls anybody's time but his own.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to an hour and can yield time to the gentleman from New York if the gentleman will accept it.

Mr. SULZER. When the gentleman concludes I want some time.

The SPEAKER. Well, but the gentleman from Illinois has the floor and has not yielded it.

Mr. SULZER. Very well; let him conclude.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor. He can yield it absolutely, or he can move the previous question.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman one-half of my time, one-half hour.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I desire to raise a question whether, by our parliamentary law, this is a question of privilege in such a way as to entitle the gentleman from Illinois to the floor as a matter of privilege; and I call the attention of the House and of the Chair to page 439 of the Manual, which declares:

A resolution to expunge a speech from the RECORD must be entertained as a matter of privilege. This does not necessarily entitle the Member implicated to the floor on a question of personal privilege.

I have no desire to cut anybody off——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Georgia refer the Chair to the page from the Manual?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Page 439.

The SPEAKER. Well, that reads as follows:

A resolution to expunge a speech from the RECORD must be entertained as a matter of privilege—

That is this case.

but this does not necessarily entitle the Member implicated—to the floor on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. SULZER—

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the Speaker read the section just below that?

The SPEAKER. It reads—

A resolution to omit from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD certain remarks declared out of order does not present a question of privilege.

Which is not this case.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. But it is similar to this case. It proposes to strike from the RECORD matters that were not delivered, and therefore not in order.

The SPEAKER. This would apply, and no doubt did, to omitting from the RECORD certain remarks declared out of order. That was before the remarks had gone in—before the RECORD had appeared.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. This is a motion to strike from the RECORD certain remarks.

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may be heard.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has the floor.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to take any advantage of the gentleman from New York in any way whatever. Therefore I reserve the balance of my time, and let the gentleman take the floor in his own right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves the balance of his time. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to allow this discussion to descend to a personal controversy between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and myself. It is a subject that rises very much above that; it is a matter of moment to the people of the entire country, and it is my purpose to see to it that the people of the country are not deceived by the gentleman from Illinois.

Now, sir, in answer to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], last Friday the gentleman from Illinois said on the floor of this House that he was the author of the law to create the Bureau of Corporations; that he originated the "idea;"

that he claimed the credit for it, and that it was one of the most laudable laws ever placed on the statute books by Congress.

That is not entirely true, and at the time I called his attention to the error and to the fact that I was the author of the law to create the Bureau of Corporations, that I originated it, and I said to him, sitting in front of his desk, that I would bet him a thousand dollars that I originated it, and introduced the first bill to bring it about, and that I would leave the question for settlement to the President. He declined to take the bet. [Laughter.] And yet when I asked him for five minutes' time to correct the error he had made, he declined to give me five minutes, although he controlled the time. I then asked for unanimous consent to speak for five minutes in order to tell the truth about how this Bureau of Corporations originated, and, to my surprise, the gentleman from Illinois rose up on his hind heels and objected. I did not think that was fair treatment, and I told him so at the time.

During that day it was impossible for me to get time to speak on the matter, but last Saturday I secured time, and I spoke on it and I quoted from the RECORD, telling the truth about the matter, from its inception down to its final enactment into law, and I think I demonstrated most conclusively to every Member of this House that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] did not originate the "idea" of this Bureau of Corporations; that the gentleman from Illinois was not the author of this law, and that the gentleman from Illinois had very little to do with it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not have very much time last Saturday to go into this matter at length, because the hour was growing late and I had been yielded only fifteen minutes. At the conclusion of my speech I asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks by placing in the RECORD, as a part of my speech, the previous RECORD of Congress of 1903, showing conclusively who was the author of this provision for the establishment of the Bureau of Corporations. It is a matter of history, it is a matter of record. It is not only in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of 1903, but it is in the book published by the Government and known as "The Department of Commerce and Labor Organization and Law." Any Member can get this book from the Congressional Library. According to this RECORD, it appears conclusively that I introduced the first bill ever introduced in Congress creating a Department of Commerce containing a provision to establish this Bureau of Corporations.

Now, sir, the RECORD of Congress shows that I introduced that bill on the 2d day of May, 1902, in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress. I appeared before the committee and other citizens appeared before the committee and argued in favor of my bill, and especially in favor of creating this Bureau of Corporations. The gentleman from Illinois was a member of the committee, and he heard the arguments and asked questions of me and of these gentlemen, all of which is a matter of record. The first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress adjourned; nothing was done. The bill was left pending in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress convened on the first Monday of December, 1902, and on the 12th day of December, 1902, the gentleman from Illinois introduced a bill for the establishment of a Department of Commerce and Labor, and in that bill he had one little provision for the establishment of a Bureau of Corporations, but it was absolutely impotent, so far as any power was concerned, and practically amounted to nothing. I appeared before the committee again and suggested the advisability of substituting my provision for the provision in the gentleman's bill.

However, a bill was reported in January, 1903, and, as I said on Saturday, I thought the bill was reported by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], the distinguished chairman of the committee, but when I looked up the records I found the bill was reported at the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I put that in the RECORD, giving the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] credit for that, although I had not given him the credit for it in my speech on Saturday. That was honest on my part; it shows how fair I wanted to be to the gentleman from Illinois [laughter on the Republican side], and how unfair the gentleman from Illinois had been in the whole matter to me. Now, when the bill came up in the House, in the Committee of the Whole, I offered, as an amendment, my provision for the establishment of this Bureau of Corporations, and the question was debated, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] taking a leading part in the debate, as the RECORD shows.

Finally it came to a vote in the Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Illinois was a teller on his side, he being against this Bureau of Corporations, and I was a teller on my side, being in favor of this Bureau of Corporations; and the vote shows that the gentleman, being in the majority, had a few more votes than I had, and the amendment went out in the Committee of the Whole, every Democrat voting for it and every Republican voting against it. Then, when the question came up in the House, the leader of the minority, Mr. Richardson, of Tennessee, at my suggestion and at the suggestion of other Members on this side of the House, offered my identical amendment for this Bureau of Corporations, on a motion to recommit the bill with instructions to amend accordingly, and on that motion the yeas and nays were demanded by myself, and on the roll call the RECORD shows that I was in favor of it and the gentleman from Illinois voted against it, and the RECORD also shows that every Republican in the House at the time voted against this Bureau of Corporations and every Democrat voted for it.

Then the bill went over to the Senate. There was no debate on it in the Senate. It was referred in a perfunctory way to the committee and reported back from the committee and went to conference. The conferees met, and in that conference they adopted part of my provision and put it in the bill, but I want to say that the best part of my provision for this Bureau of Corporations was not put in the bill, and if it had been it would have been a very much better bill and it would have been a very much better Bureau of Corporations, because my amendment provided—and any Member here who will read it will see for himself—that this information when collated by these investigations of the criminal trusts of the country should be furnished to the Congress as well as to the President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is the point I wanted to make the other day when this resolution of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was pending in this House and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] shut me out and prevented me from doing so. But there was a lot of other matter left out, and finally they did agree in conference upon the establishment of a Bureau of Corporations, and as it was agreed to it was reported by the conferees and printed in the RECORD, and if any Member or anybody in this country will read that conference report and will read my original provision for the establishment of this Bureau of Corporations he will see that the conferees took out of my provision practically what is in the law to-day, but did not take out enough to make the law what the law ought to be in order to get the data regarding violations of the law by the criminal trusts of our country, so that the President could act, so that the Attorney-General could act, so that Congress could act in case additional legislation was needed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is practically the story of the creation of this Bureau of Corporations, and I submit to any impartial Member of this House whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was the "author" of the law; whether he originated the "idea" or whether I originated the idea; and I submit that question to the people of this country, and if the gentleman wants additional information in regard to it, I would commend him to the President of the United States, who knows the truth about what the conferees were finally compelled to do after telegrams were sent to members of the Senate saying no more antitrust legislation was wanted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it is an injustice to a Member when he has unanimous consent to extend his remarks, and in the extension tells the truth, and the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, regarding a matter under consideration, for a Republican Member who has been "caught with the goods" to come into the House, and because he is in the majority get another Republican Member to offer a resolution to strike out of the RECORD a Democratic speech because the Democratic speech tells the truth and the truth happens to hurt the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, never since I have been a Member of this House have I asked for recognition on the ground of personal privilege. I have never asked for anything but my rights, and I hardly get them; but I say to you, and I serve notice on the Republicans, that if they adopt this resolution to strike out of the RECORD a part of my speech, they will hear more from me from now until the close of this Congress. [Laughter.] Do not be in a hurry, my friends. The Republican party is the opportunist party of the country. Whenever a Democrat or the Democratic party originates anything that is good the Republican party comes along a few years afterwards and seizes it and claims it as its own. Republicans have been doing that; the Republican party has been doing that for years; and it is time that we Democrats who have to take the Republicans by the nape of the neck every now and then to compel them to respond to the demands of the people of the country, should tell the truth about it, and when we do get the Republicans to respond and enact the legislation we originate, that we initiate, we do not intend that you shall steal the credit and claim the glory or get away with the goods. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that if there is anything in my speech in the RECORD that reflects on him personally I will consent to strike it out. If there is anything in my speech that is not strictly in accordance with the facts relating to the history of the legislation to create the Bureau of Corporations I will consent to strike it out; but if you ruthlessly strike out a part of my speech by adopting the resolution just offered, because you have the power and numbers to do so, I will get it back in the RECORD, and I will get it back in the RECORD in a way that will do the Republicans more harm before the people of the country than does the present RECORD.

As I said in the beginning, I repeat now, that I do not intend to allow this question to sink into a personal controversy between the gentleman from Illinois and myself. It rises above that. This is a question which I have placed right before the people of the country and right before the Members of this House. I stand on the RECORD. I abide by the RECORD, and I say to the gentleman from Illinois that he barks and gets bitten and then whines; and I am surprised that the gentleman has appeared to-day in his mean, little, pettifogging way, whining and squealing—because he deceived the House and he deceived the country the other day when he said he originated the "idea;" that he was the author of the "law" to create the Bureau of Corporations. His claim was preposterous and ridiculous, and nobody knew it better than the gentleman from Illinois when he said it; but he did it deliberately, and when he was told he was deceiving the House he refused to give me permission to reply to correct the misstatement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will suspend.

Mr. SULZER. Well, I have. Hit the gavel again if you want to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. The gentleman is out of order in his remarks, and it is the duty of the Chair to so state to the gentleman.

Mr. SULZER. Is my time up, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. SULZER. Exactly. I will proceed in order. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has forty-three minutes.

Mr. SULZER. Then, Mr. Speaker, for fear that the Republicans may adopt this resolution and strike out my speech, I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have those parts read in my time, or if they will allow the RECORD to stand as it is, I will close and say nothing further. I ask the Clerk to read all of the speech to which exception is made. What I mean by that is all that part of the RECORD to which exception is made in the pending resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I understand the request of the gentleman is to print in the RECORD now that which the gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is trying to ascertain.

Mr. SULZER. I will read it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will indicate what it is. Does the gentleman propose to put in at this time, now, what the gentleman from Illinois proposes to strike out?

Mr. SULZER. Not exactly.

The SPEAKER. Please indicate.

Mr. SULZER. For fear the Clerk might read slowly, and I can read pretty fast, I will read it myself.

Mr. SULZER (reading).

When the gentleman had finished his speech I requested him to yield me five minutes—

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman can not read and put in the RECORD that which the House is now deliberating upon striking out.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman does not know whether I am going to put that identical matter in the RECORD or not. The gentleman can not tell what I am going to put in the RECORD until I read it.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I understand so far as he has read a portion of that which the gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out now, so judging from that I think even the gentleman from New York understands what the proposition does.

Mr. SULZER. I hope the time used by the gentleman from New York is not coming out of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to understand what the point is that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] makes, if any. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point that this is not germane to the resolution before the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] must confine himself to the discussion of the matter before the House?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; my point was that what he is proposing to read is not germane to the question before the House and not in order, and that he should confine his remarks to the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. So far as the Chair has heard the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], considering the point that the gentleman makes, as the Chair understands his point, the gentleman is not devoting his remarks to the resolution before the House. The Chair will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] that in the opinion of the Chair the point is well taken, and that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] under the rules of the House should confine himself to the discussion of the resolution pending.

Mr. SULZER. Exactly. That is what I intend to do, Mr. Speaker. I trust the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will not interrupt me again. I have only forty-three minutes. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. SULZER. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], like a pettifogging lawyer, has dodged all around this question——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from New York that it is not in order to use such terms——

Mr. SULZER. I did not call him any names. I said like——

The SPEAKER. Toward any Member of the House, and it is the duty of the Chair to call the gentleman to order. The gentleman will proceed in order under the rules of the House.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], as I was saying [laughter], carefully ignores the real question at issue, both in his answer to my speech the other day and in his supplication to-day. He did not dare assert again, in answer to my speech the other day (Saturday), that he was the author of the Bureau of Corporations. He did not again claim that he originated the "idea." He does not dare claim that now. He leaves that all out now. But he wants to strike out of the RECORD the part of my speech which tells the exact facts regarding the matter, and does not talk about the real issue. Did he, or did he not, originate the "idea" of the Bureau of Corporations? That is the question before the House; that is the question before the country. The question is whether he originated the "idea," as he claimed originally, or whether he did not. And I think I have demonstrated most conclusively that he did not.

Mr. MACON. Read the parts he wants you to strike out.

Mr. SULZER. As I said in my speech the other day, that is the RECORD all right, so far as this Bureau of Corporations is concerned. It is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of 1903, and I put it in the RECORD again Saturday to refresh the memory of the gentleman from Illinois. And it appears at that time, in 1903, that the gentleman debated the proposition to create a Bureau of Corporations, and was very much opposed to it. When the question came up in the House in 1903, he voted against my amendment for a Bureau of Corporations—that could accomplish something. He also voted against the Bureau of Corporations, as appears by the RECORD, when the bill was on its final passage, and the then Democratic leader of the House [Mr. Richardson] moved to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to amend by adopting my provision for the Bureau of Corporations. It was the same identical amendment, as the RECORD will show. That question was voted upon in the House and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] voted against it.

Now, sir, let us see what else the gentleman from Illinois now objects to. He can not object to that. That is a matter of record. The RECORD speaks for itself, and I appeal to the RECORD. And I submit that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], or, for that matter, any other Republican in this House, can not now take credit for the creation of this Bureau of Corporations. But let us proceed by the RECORD. After the bill passed the House it went to the Senate and was referred, without debate, to the Senate committee. A few days later it was reported to the Senate and a conference was asked and a conference committee appointed, and then the bill came back to the House, and a conference committee was appointed on the part of the House, and the bill then went to conference. In the conference committee the bill was perfected and the provision for the Bureau of Corporations greatly enlarged, although it did not go as far as my provision went, by a long way. Now, I repeat that. That is the fact. That is the truth. That is the record. The conferees at that time, in 1903, took out of my provision for this Bureau certain parts of it and ignored other parts—the best and most vital parts. The parts they took out and incorporated in the bill made the bill very much better. But if they had adopted all of the provisions in my bill for this Bureau of Corporations, it would have been a very much better bill.

Now, sir, how did the conferees at that time come to do this? That is the question. As I said the other morning, and I will repeat, if the conferees would tell the truth about this matter, the country would know that the President of the United States had something to do with this matter, and for that reason in my remarks on Saturday I quoted from the President's letter of acceptance. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to enlighten the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] again at this time about this matter. I wanted to do it Saturday, and he declined to let me do so then. I think his memory serves him quite well, but I think when he made the misstatement he did he thought that somebody else's memory was not quite so good, and that is the reason he indulged in a speech so wide of the real facts of the case.

But I want to be charitable to the gentleman from Illinois. I do not want to be cruel. If I wanted to be real mean, I could be; but, in all fairness, it seems to me that when a Democrat who has been working as hard and as long and as faithfully in the minority as I have, trying, as I have been trying, for nearly fourteen years as a Member of this House to do something good, to accomplish something for the benefit of all the people—and doing it in the face of intense Republican opposition—and then when I have finally accomplished something good, something that a Republican President sees fit to commend in his letter of acceptance, it seems to me, I say, that it is cruel for a Republican Member to attempt to take away the credit; and I submit to the impartial judgment of the country that any Republican who does do it is small indeed, and stoops to the very quintessence of partisan meanness.

Mr. Speaker, as I said in my speech the other day, I want to repeat now, and I hope that it will settle this question of the "idea" of the Bureau of Corporations for all time to come, so far as the gentleman from Illinois is concerned and so far as this question is concerned, that the gentleman did not originate this idea of the Bureau of Corporations. I claim, and the RECORD sustains me, that this was my handiwork, my idea, and not the idea of the gentleman from Illinois. My bill was introduced on the 2d of May, 1902. It was referred by the Speaker to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. There were hearings on the bill before the committee in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, and I appeared before the committee and argued in favor of my bill, and especially in favor of the provision in my bill for this Bureau of Corporations.

That was the first time the "idea" for such a bureau ever was introduced by a bill in this House. In those hearings I stated to the committee that I hoped it would report my bill, but that if it reported another bill I indulged the expectation that the committee would incorporate in the bill the provision in my bill to create this Bureau of Corporations. The gentleman from Illinois was present at these hearings and heard all that was said. He was listening, and he is a good listener. Other gentlemen also appeared before the committee in favor of my bill, and especially in favor of the provision creating the Bureau of Corporations. I reiterate now all that I said at that time. Let the RECORD of Congress speak for itself. It tells the story.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the record and the history of this Bureau of Corporations.

The first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress adjourned. I want to say, gentlemen, that at the beginning of the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress the people of the country who favored this legislation, in order to find out whether the criminal trusts of the country were violating the laws or not, came to Washington and urged the committee to report my bill, or especially a bill with this provision of mine in it, for this Bureau of Corporations. Now, I submit to the candid judgment of this House and to the country the question whether the gentleman from Illinois or myself originated the "idea" of this provision to create the Bureau of Corporations; and I submit to the fairness of the membership of this House and to the country the difference between the provision in the bill of the gentleman from Illinois, introduced December 12, 1902, and the provision in my bill, introduced May 2, 1902, for the establishment of this Bureau of Corporations. There is as much difference between the two provisions as there is between day and night.

Now, where did the gentleman from Illinois get the "idea" of the Bureau of Corporations? It must be apparent to anyone who studies the history of the legislation on the matter that he got his "idea" from me and from my bill. He has talked twice on the proposition within the past few days and he has not denied that he got the "idea" from me. He never originated the "idea," and he has no right to stand on the floor of this House and claim the credit. I claim that I am entitled to the credit, if anyone is, because I am the author of it and introduced the first bill; and I, and not the gentleman from Illinois, according to the RECORD, was the author of this Bureau of Corporations, and originated the "idea."

Now, sir, that I have read substantially what the gentleman from Illinois takes exception to and what he wants stricken out of the RECORD, I am satisfied to let the matter stand in the RECORD as it is. I am content to let this matter go before the people of this country upon the facts and upon the RECORD, and I undertake to say that there is not a man in all this land who looks into this question and studies it from its inception to its consummation who will not agree with me that the gentleman from Illinois was not the author of, and did not originate the "idea" of the law for the Bureau of Corporations, and that he is entitled to no credit for the "idea." And that is what I want to get before the people of the country. And now it goes before the people of the country, and I want to say again to the gentleman from Illinois that the trouble with him is that as a Member of this House he is the mere alter ego of the Speaker; he carries the orders from the Speaker's room to the floor of the House, and is always ready to get up and object to any bill that some Member thinks he is going to get through by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stands before the membership of this House as the man who knows it all, claims it all, and wants it all. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the resolution reported again in my time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution in the time of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 21, 1908, be corrected by striking out, on pages 3820, 3821, 3822, 3823, 3824, 3825, and 3826, the speech purporting to have been delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] and inserting in lieu thereof the transcript of the notes of the official reporters of the House of the speech actually made, together with the copy of any record referred to in such speech.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at this time to discuss the matter as to who originated the Department of Commerce and Labor or any Bureau of it. That is not the question before the House. All I want and ask is that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, purporting to give the substance of a debate in this House, shall give it substantially as it was delivered in the House, and that it shall not be absolutely changed and falsified in a way to make it appear that something entirely different was said and done in the House from what actually was said and done.

The resolution proposes to strike out what is now in the RECORD and to insert what the gentleman from New York said, with the copies of the records that he referred to, and which he had consent to insert in the RECORD.

I ask for the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SULZER. Division!

The House proceeded to divide.

Pending the division—

Mr. SULZER. In order to save time, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 151, nays 92, answering "present" 24, not voting 121, as follows:

DELAWARE AND HUDSON COMPANY.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 5043) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to convey to the Delaware and Hudson Company a right of way for railway purposes upon and across the military reservation of Plattsburg Barracks, at Plattsburg, in the county of Clinton and State of New York, in exchange for the release to the United States of all rights of said company and its subsidiary companies within the limits of said military reservation, and that it be considered in the House at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent——

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The other gentleman from New York objects.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks which I made on last Friday on the pension appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the pension appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether the gentleman from Illinois would move to strike it out of the RECORD after it comes in?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MARY A. COULSON.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document, to accompany report No. 629 on the bill (H. R. 1072), for the relief of Mary A. Coulson, executrix of Sewell Coulson, deceased, a letter from the Attorney-General of the United States dated March 20, 1906, discussing the merits of the claim embraced in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire what the letter is about.

Mr. CHANEY. It is a response of the Attorney-General of the United States to a call of the committee respecting the merits of the claim, which is reported favorably for action in the House.

Mr. SULZER. Was there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. CHANEY. There is a report which has already been made from the committee, and I want the letter of the Attorney-General in.

Mr. SULZER. Was this letter written after the report was made?

Mr. CHANEY. No; this letter was written on the 20th of March, 1906.

Mr. SULZER. Then it should have been in the report in the first instance, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

RAILROAD BRIDGE OVER MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 18450) authorizing the construction of a railroad bridge over the Mississippi River, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

EXTENDING TIME FOR COMPLETION OF LINES OF EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12438) extending the time limit for the completion of the lines of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time limit for the completion of the lines of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company is hereby extended for eighteen months from the passage of this act.

With the following amendments.

Insert at the end of the bill the words:

"Provided, That within one month after the approval of this act the said East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company shall deposit with the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia the sum of $1,000 to guarantee the construction of said railway within the time herein limited. If this sum is not so deposited this act shall be void; if this sum is deposited and the said railroad company shall fail to construct and have in operation at least 1 mile of track in addition to that now in operation, within the time herein prescribed, the said sum shall be forfeited to the District of Columbia and this act shall be void."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the report in this case read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report No. 1169.

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12438) extending the time limit for the completion of the lines of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass when amended as follows:

Add at the end of line 5, page 1, the following proviso:

"Provided, That within one month after the approval of this act the said East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company shall deposit with the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia the sum of $1,000 to guarantee the construction of said railway within the time herein limited. If this sum is not so deposited this act shall be void; if this sum is deposited and the said railroad company shall fail to construct and have in operation at least 1 mile of track in addition to that now in operation within the time herein prescribed, said sum shall be forfeited to the District of Columbia and this act shall be void."

The bill as originally introduced and referred to this committee was submitted to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for examination and report before consideration by the committee. The amendment above recommended was suggested by the Commissioners, in view of the extensions of time which have been heretofore granted in the premises, and it is entirely satisfactory to the company. The circumstances of such extensions and the reasons for the proposed further extension are set forth by the Commissioners in the following letter:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 29, 1908.

SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to submit the following on House bill 12438, Sixtieth Congress, first session, "Extending the time limit for the completion of the lines of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company," which you referred to them for examination and report.

The original charter of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company was granted by act of June 18, 1898, the road to be completed within two years from the date of the passage of the act. Extensions of time have since been granted by acts of April 30, 1900, July 1, 1902, and April 26, 1904, the last extension being for a term of eighteen months from the passage of the act, and providing that at the expiration of the said period the franchise should be void for such lines, and for only such lines, as had not been constructed. Prior, however, to the expiration of this period the portion of the line had been constructed, of about three-fourths of a mile in length, running from the western end of the Pennsylvania Avenue Bridge across the said bridge to a point just beyond Minnesota avenue, and since the construction of this line a service which is believed to be entirely satisfactory to the people living in Randle Highlands and Twining City has been given by this company.

The purpose of the within bill is to revive or extend such portions of the franchise as were allowed to lapse by the failure to construct within the period prescribed in the act of April 26, 1904. There seems to be no objection to this extension and the Commissioners recommend favorable action, but believe that some forfeiture should be imposed for failure to construct at least a portion of the line for which the franchise extension is asked. They have therefore to suggest an addition to the bill, as shown on the amended copy submitted herewith, which provides for the deposit of $1,000 by the company prior to the beginning of the work of construction and the forfeiture of this $1,000 upon the failure of the company to build and operate at least 1 mile of road within the time of extension called for in the bill.

Very respectfully,

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
President Board of Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. S. W. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan if there is any assurance of the extension of this road aside from the thousand-dollar forfeiture, if the bill be enacted into law, if the additional time be granted.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I understand——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I learn from the reading of the report that the original grant was made in 1898, and there have been three separate acts of Congress extending the time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is correct.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, it seems to me that the time of Congress ought not to be taken up in further extending the time in which this road is to be constructed unless there is some assurance aside even from the thousand-dollar forfeiture.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman that in addition to the thousand dollars provided for, they have some material on the ground and expect to go ahead and complete the line.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the gentleman I presume is of the opinion that Congress will not be called upon in eighteen months to pass a still further act of extension.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope not.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to ask the gentleman how much road this particular company has now in operation?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. One mile, as stated in the report.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is that actually being used?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. This company was created for the purpose of building this particular line of road?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. DRISCOLL. It had no road before that, or any franchise before that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not that I know of.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The company has built about a mile, and how many miles are yet to be built by this particular bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. One or 2 miles.

Mr. DRISCOLL. That is all?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Has this particular company any other franchise by which it is permitted to build roads?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know of any. I think this is a meritorious proposition. They have been giving service to the people over there, and I think the franchise ought to be extended.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is this one of the subsidiary companies; and, if so, what company is its parent?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is not a subsidiary company; it has nothing to do with the Capital Traction Company or the Washington Railway and Electric Company; it is an independent company.

Mr. DRISCOLL. It may be independent in form, but is it independent in fact and in substance?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is independent in every sense, as far as I know.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I have not heard of any excuse the company has given in recent years for not building the road——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the excuse is that they could not get the capital. That is, of course, one of the best excuses that can be given.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Its franchise has already elapsed, more than two years ago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir; that is true. I think the amount they are asked to put up, a thousand dollars, is an ample amount to ask for a forfeit and all that could possibly be asked under the circumstances.

Mr. DRISCOLL. You think it is an ample forfeit?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it is, right at this time. I think it is proper, and certainly no harm can come to anybody by the extension of the franchise.

Mr. DRISCOLL. There is no other company that wants to build it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not that I have heard of.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And the gentleman from Michigan favors it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I just wanted to inquire of the Speaker upon what the vote is to be taken.

The SPEAKER. Upon the committee amendment, as the Chair understands it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I want to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, can we have the amendment again reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. This amendment is a committee amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Pardon me; yes.

Mr. SULZER. Then, I wish to know why the committee did not put it in the bill when it reported the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was reported in the bill when it was reported.

Mr. SULZER. It is reported in the bill as an amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir; it is in the bill H. R. 12438 and recommended by the Commissioners.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "one," in line 9 of the printed bill, and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten," so as to read, "$10,000."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to say that my information is that this charter has been in the hands of the present company for five or six years. The charter has existed, according to my information, for more than fifteen years. They have now constructed but three-quarters of a mile of road across the bridge, and the company, my information is, has only two second-class, secondhand "bobtail" cars. They have no power of their own, but get it from the Capital Traction Company, as I understand it, and a thousand dollars is, in my judgment, no bonus to deposit for good faith in this matter, where the company has dillydallied with this proposition for so many years. I hope the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment requiring the company to deposit $10,000 as an evidence of good faith.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to say to the gentleman that I do not think that is a reasonable amendment under the circumstances. If I did not believe these people intended in good faith to go on and try and complete the line, I should not present the bill which is offered here. I think $10,000 would be too great a burden, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw the amendment. But if he insists upon it, I do hope it will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "the time herein prescribed," in lines 2 and 3, on page 2 of Senate bill, and insert in lieu thereof the words "six months after the approval of this act."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, Mr. Speaker, under the bill as it now stands this company has eighteen months in which to complete 1 mile of railway track. It is an absolute injustice to the people living in that section of the country, without any street railroad privileges, and utterly impossible for them to get any, that this concern, holding a franchise, should delay the necessary improvements that would be made in that section. Now, certainly, Mr. Speaker, six months is long enough for any railroad company that has held its charter four or five years to build one mile of railway track, when the people over there have been kept out of it for all these years. Other companies have been prevented from going there, the organization of other companies that would build the line has been prevented, and those people have been denied these privileges on account of the franchise owned by this dilatory company which, I am informed, is simply a speculative affair, and now they are to be held out for eighteen months longer. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman ought to accept this amendment in justice to the people who live in the locality to be benefited by this railroad company.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to say to the gentleman that after full hearing had before the Commissioners on this question they reported they thought eighteen months was not an unjustifiable length of time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the gentleman think that his committee or that this House ought to make legislation in reference to the District of Columbia dependent upon what the Commissioners say?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, not altogether; but, of course, we are guided to some extent by their judgment. They certainly have much more time to investigate many of these questions than does the District Committee or any individual member of it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is true; and will not the gentleman say it is true that ex-Congressman Bliss, formerly a Member of this body from the State of New York, and other citizens interested out there, came before the committee and insisted upon having these people expedite that work? And is it not true that he and the other people interested are practically unanimous in their opposition to this eighteen months' extension of time?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not so understand it, and I do not recall that Mr. Bliss, and I do not think anybody else, has been before the committee, as the gentleman suggests, at this Congress and objected to any extension of time. The fact is, the only stockholder or the only person I know in connection with it is the gentleman mentioned in the last annual report, Mr. Randall. I met him on a car somewhere in the city during the last three or four months, and he said that if they were permitted to have this extension of time that they would complete the road and that they also had material upon the ground.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows Mr. Randall?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Only casually. I remember meeting the gentleman. I think the gentleman was before the Committee on the District of Columbia in the last Congress, and I think I can say to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] that if Mr. Randall should come into the room now I do not think I would know him.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will permit me, and I hope he will, I desire to make this statement: Ex-Congressman Bliss was at my office this morning, and he certainly does protest. He tells me that he represents the citizens out there and that they protest very strongly against giving these people eighteen months' additional time in which to build 1 mile of track.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, certainly these people have been accommodated by the tracks and line which these people have already built, and the gentleman has only to visit that locality to see the character of the country.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. This bill, I notice, does not make any provision for universal transfer and for regulation by the Commissioners of the District. Does the gentleman from Michigan understand that the provision for universal transfers and regulation by the District Commissioners in the general railway bill will be sufficiently comprehensive to cover all the street railway legislation?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the bill we passed some time ago becomes a law, I believe it will govern this case, too. This road now gives transfers to the Capital Traction Company.

Mr. MADDEN. It is what we can force them to do that I am interested in.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the bill we passed some time ago becomes a law, I think it will control in this case.

Mr. MADDEN. I have a copy of the other bill before me, but I am rather inclined to agree with the gentleman; and I am willing to take his word just now, that if it does not cover it we can make provision for it hereafter.

Mr. DOUGLAS. How often, may I ask the gentleman from Michigan, has this franchise been extended?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Three times.

Mr. DOUGLAS. When was the franchise originally granted?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In 1898.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Division!

The House divided, and there were—ayes 30, noes 48.

Mr. SULZER. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules the doors will be closed; the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absentees. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. As many as are in favor of agreeing to the amendment will, as their names are called, answer "yea;" as many as are opposed will answer "nay;" those not voting will answer "present;" and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 93, nays 141, answered "present" 18, not voting 136, as follows:

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I desire to change my vote, then, and answer present.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia and he answered present.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote on the bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In that connection, I desire to amend by striking out the word "eighteen" and inserting the word "twelve," making it twelve months instead of eighteen.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "eighteen months" and insert "one year."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to say that the committee will accept that amendment, making the time twelve months instead of eighteen.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I understand the chairman of the committee to say that on behalf of the committee they accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The House will have to dispose of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Michigan, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MEDICAL OR SURGICAL SERVICES TO FIREMEN.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 15230) to amend an act approved February 28, 1901, entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of February 28, 1901, entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," be amended by adding thereto the following:

"SEC. 4a. That hereafter whenever any member of the fire department of the District of Columbia in the actual discharge of his duty shall become so disabled by sickness or injury as to require services or treatment other than such as can be rendered by the board of police and fire surgeons, the expense of such services or treatment may be paid from the firemen's pension fund: Provided, That no such expenses shall be paid except upon the recommendation of the chief engineer of the fire department, approved by the Commissioners of said District, and such recommendation must be accompanied by a certificate from some competent surgeon setting forth the nature and cause of the sickness or disability which rendered such services or treatment necessary."

With the following committee amendments:

Insert, on page 1, line 10, after the word "require," the words "medical or surgical."

Strike out of page 2, lines 4 and 5, the words "some competent surgeon" and insert in lieu thereof the words "a member of the board of fire surgeons."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. DRISCOLL. I want to ask what the firemen themselves say about this. Are they in favor of it or not?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The firemen, as represented by their chief officer, are in favor of it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Do you know anything about what the rank and file think of it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I have not made calls on the rank and file, but there has been absolutely no objection to it, and from the terms of the bill it must be one that they want, because it simply gives them the right to have special service in addition to that which they already receive from the police surgeons.

Mr. DRISCOLL. But it is taken out of their fund.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. But only a small portion of that fund is created by the firemen themselves.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

LICENSES FOR DRIVERS OF PASSENGER VEHICLES.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 15231) to amend the license law approved July 1, 1902, with respect to licenses of drivers of passenger vehicles for hire.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 11 of section 7 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," providing for license taxes in the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following:

"That any and all persons employed or engaged in driving a horse or horses or other animal or animals attached to coaches, omnibuses, carriages, wagons, or other passenger vehicles for hire shall pay an annual license tax of $1: Provided, That such license shall not in any case be issued except upon application therefor to the assessor by the person desiring the license and upon approval of such issue by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, under such general regulations as they may prescribe, after report made by some member of the Metropolitan police designated to inspect public vehicles to the major and superintendent of police; and it shall be the duty of the major and superintendent of police to forward said report to said Commissioners through the assessor of the District of Columbia. And there shall be kept in the department of police a list of names of all drivers, their annual license number, and any record that may be necessary concerning the conduct of drivers of public vehicles that may be required in connection with good public vehicle service: Provided, That licenses issued under the provisions hereof shall not be assigned or transferred, and every assignment or transfer of any such license shall be illegal, null, and void. Any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this amendment shall be punished as provided in paragraph 47 of said section 7."

Mr. LANDIS. I should like to ask the gentleman what the license is at the present time?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. MCMILLAN. The present license is from $6 to $11, but that only applies to the owner and proprietor. It does not cover the driver. This only means that the driver shall be registered and his position qualified. It lends dignity to the driver. He has an opportunity of saying, "I am a licensed driver." He pays a dollar for that, and, in case of accident, the Department has his name and knows where it can find him. This bill is solely for the purpose of registering the drivers, and it will have the ultimate effect of affording protection to a good driver.

Mr. LANDIS. It simply adds to the law; it does not change existing law?

Mr. MCMILLAN. It changes no existing law.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to know whether this is for the purpose of raising the grade of the driver or for the purpose of raising money?

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is for the purpose of raising the grade of the driver.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Why does not the gentleman include, if this is for the purpose of raising the grade of the driver and to prevent accidents, why does not the committee include chauffeurs of automobiles?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think the law covers that in a separate section.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE HOSPITALS AND ASYLUMS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 17305) to regulate the establishment and maintenance of private hospitals and asylums in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no person shall in the District of Columbia establish or maintain any private hospital or asylum, either for the reception of human beings or of domestic animals, unless or until licensed by the Commissioners of said District so to do.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the health officer of the District of Columbia, and of such agents and employees in the service of the health department of said District as he may designate for that purpose, to enforce the provisions of this act and of all regulations made by authority thereof; and said health officer and agents and employees are hereby authorized, in the performance of the duty aforesaid, to enter and inspect during all reasonable hours all private hospitals and asylums in said District. No person shall interfere with said health officer, or with any agent or employee aforesaid, in the performance of his official duty, nor hinder, prevent, or refuse to permit any inspection authorized by this act.

SEC. 3. That any person who, for himself or as the employee or agent of another person, or as a member, officer, or employee of a firm or corporation, violates any of the provisions of this act or any regulations made hereunder by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or aids in the violation thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $200 or by imprisonment for not more than thirty days, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to promulgate from time to time such regulations as in their judgment public interests require to govern the establishment and maintenance of private hospitals and asylums, whether for human beings or for domestic animals, and to regulate the issue, suspension, and revocation of licenses aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That all prosecutions under this act shall be in the police court of the District of Columbia upon information signed by the corporation counsel of said District or by one of his assistants.

SEC. 6. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out of page 1, line 6, the words "so to do" and insert a period after the word "District," in said line.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire if there is anything in this bill that restricts in any way chiropractic treatment in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT].

Mr. OLCOTT. Nothing whatever; the bill provides that if a private hospital is established, permit must be obtained from the Commissioners, and that they shall have the supervision over the hospital. It has nothing to do with chiropractic treatment.

Mr. SULZER. What change does it make in existing law?

Mr. OLCOTT. The District appropriation bill of March 2, 1895, provided:

That hereafter no other building for use as a public or private hospital for contagious diseases shall be erected in the District of Columbia within 300 feet of any building owned by a private individual or any other party than the one erecting the building. All private hospitals in the District of Columbia shall be required to secure a permit from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and said hospitals shall be at all times subject to inspection by the health officer of said District or his deputy, and any person or persons refusing to permit such inspection shall each be subject to a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $200 for each of such refusals.

Mr. SULZER. Does this bill increase the license fee?

Mr. OLCOTT. Absolutely not. It is a law which enables the provision attached to the appropriation bill to be carried out. No means were provided to enable the Commissioners to carry out the law.

Mr. SULZER. Is it the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to ask the gentleman if this discriminates between the several schools of medicine?

Mr. OLCOTT. Not in the slightest.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does it involve in any way the merit of the several schools?

Mr. OLCOTT. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does this apply to Christian Science in any way, or to mental healing, in case Scientists or healers take the patients to their homes?

Mr. OLCOTT. It is merely for the establishment of private hospitals.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If a man takes a patient or two to his home and treats them in his way, is not that a private hospital, and would it not be so construed?

Mr. OLCOTT. The laws of the District of Columbia provide for the granting of a license to practicing physicians of the several schools of medicine. I do not know whether there is any particular provision relative to the Christian Science cult, but I know that this does not in any way affect the law relative to that.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I think it would. If this applies to a private asylum, if a man should take a few patients into his home for the purpose of treating them mentally, or by Christian Science, he may be within the provisions of this statute.

Mr. LANDIS. Well, why not?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I think it ought to have more consideration than we are giving it here.

Mr. OLCOTT. Then he would come under the provisions of the law as it now exists.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will he not come under the provision of this law?

Mr. OLCOTT. No; no person can practice medicine in the District of Columbia without taking out a license.

Mr. DRISCOLL. He may not be practicing medicine; he may have people in his house, treating them in his way, and he may be deemed to come under this law. He may be prohibited from doing it under this proposed statute. Was it the intention of the gentleman to make any attack on them?

Mr. OLCOTT. Not the slightest; it has absolutely nothing to do with that. It is merely to provide a method to give effect to the law as it now exists under this proviso in a former appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OLCOTT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REGISTRATION OF CASES OF TUBERCULOSIS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ETC.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (S. 29) to provide for registration of all cases of tuberculosis in the District of Columbia, for free examination of sputum in suspected cases, and for preventing the spread of tuberculosis in said District, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of every physician in the District of Columbia to report in writing to the health officer of said District, within one week after the disease is suspected, on forms to be provided by said health officer, the name, age, sex, color, occupation, and address of every person under his care in said District who, in his opinion, is afflicted with pulmonary or other communicable form of tuberculosis. It shall also be the duty of the officer having charge for the time being of each and every hospital, dispensary, asylum, or other similar public or private institution in said District to report in like manner the name, age, sex, color, occupation, and last address of every person who is in his care or who has come under his observation within one week of such time who, in his opinion, is afflicted with pulmonary or other communicable form of tuberculosis.

SEC. 2. That the health officer of said District shall promptly make, or cause to be made by a competent microscopist, a microscopical examination of the sputum of persons thus reported, and shall make a report thereof, free of charge, to the physician or officer upon whose application the examination was made. If the examination fails to show the existence of the disease, that fact shall be recorded.

SEC. 3. That the health officer of said District shall cause all cases showing the presence of tubercle bacilli to be recorded in a register of which he shall be the custodian, which register shall not be open to inspection by anyone except the health officer and the deputy health officer of said District, and neither said health officer nor said deputy health officer shall permit any such record to be divulged in such manner as to disclose the identity of the person to whom it relates except as it may be necessary in carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the health department, in every case where a microscopical examination reveals the existence of tuberculosis, to supply to such person, or those in charge of such person, unless otherwise requested by the attending physician, printed instructions as to the methods to be employed to prevent the spread of the disease.

SEC. 5. That in case of death from pulmonary or other communicable form of tuberculosis, or the removal from any apartment or premises of a person or persons so afflicted, it shall be the duty of the attending physician, if he has such knowledge, or, if there be no such physician or if such physician be absent, of the owner, lessee, tenant, occupant, or other person in charge of said apartment or premises to notify the health officer, in writing, of such death or removal, within twenty-four hours thereafter, and such apartment or premises shall then be disinfected by the health department at public expense or, if the owner prefers, by the owner to the satisfaction of the health department, and shall not again be occupied until so disinfected.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of every person afflicted with tuberculosis, and of every person in attendance upon anyone afflicted therewith, and of the authorities of public and private institutions or dispensaries in said District to observe and enforce all sanitary rules and regulations of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for preventing the spread of the disease.

SEC. 7. That upon the recovery of any person who has been found to be suffering from tuberculosis a report to that effect to the health department, made by the attending physician, shall be recorded in the register aforesaid, and shall relieve such person from further liability to any requirements imposed by this act.

SEC. 8. That any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $25.

SEC. 9. That all prosecutions under this act shall be in the police court of said District upon information brought in the name of the District of Columbia and on its behalf.

SEC. 10. That all acts and parts of acts contrary to or inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and they are hereby, repealed.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 5, strike out the word "suspected" and insert the word "recognized."

On page 3, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "or the removal from any apartment or premises of a person or persons so afflicted."

Page 3, line 13, strike out the words "or removal."

Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I notice in section 6 it is provided that it shall be the duty of every person afflicted with tuberculosis and of every person in attendance upon anyone afflicted therewith, and of the authorities of public and private institutions or dispensaries in said District to observe and enforce all sanitary rules and regulations of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for preventing the spread of the disease. How is it proposed to enforce that provision of the law?

Mr. OLCOTT. I think that can be enforced just as readily as all other health ordinances are enforced, by the proper health authorities.

Mr. MANN. In what way—by penalty?

Mr. OLCOTT. It is true that they would be liable to a penalty of $25, but that same provision is made for violations of any of the ordinances of the board of health to-day.

Mr. MANN. Section 8 provides that any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $25, so that that provision provides a penalty for violation of section 6, and we enact a law providing that it shall be a misdemeanor for any person afflicted with tuberculosis, or any person in attendance upon anyone afflicted therewith, to not enforce or observe all sanitary rules and regulations of the Commissioners. Have we the power to say that there shall be a penalty if somebody afflicted with tuberculosis shall not enforce or observe all the rules and regulations of the Commissioners?

Mr. OLCOTT. I think we have the same power to enforce regulations we are now making for the prevention of the spread of tuberculosis as we have for any other health regulation.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. STAFFORD. What power, I would like to ask the gentleman, have we to provide a penalty for some regulation the Commissioners may see fit to prescribe.

Mr. OLCOTT. There is the general provision in the Code of the District of Columbia as to how persons guilty of misdemeanors of any kind shall be proceeded against and how penalties and fines shall be collected. If it is proper to attach a penalty for misdemeanor under this act, the law can be enforced in exactly the same way as in other cases where there are violations of the rules of the health department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think it is within the power of Congress to make criminal any regulation department officials may in the future formulate?

Mr. OLCOTT. I have no doubt whatever that under the act as it now exists where we make something a misdemeanor that is not now a misdemeanor the same code will give authority to enforce the provisions of the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. My point is directed to the authority of delegating to a department official the right to make criminal any regulation that he may prescribe.

Mr. OLCOTT. We do not. This law says certain things must be done and that the failure to carry out the law shall be deemed a misdemeanor.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the point of the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was that section 8 provides that any person violating any of the provisions of this act would be guilty of a misdemeanor, and that that extended to the regulations that might be prescribed by the Commissioners of the District under section 6.

Mr. OLCOTT. Well, that is true as to the present ordinance regulations, not only of the health department, but of all the subsidiary departments, and the violation of any of those regulations is a misdemeanor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then we are vesting in the District Commissioners authority to make criminal law?

Mr. OLCOTT. No; it makes a violation of the regulations of a department which has charge of several subjects a misdemeanor.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I believe the Federal Government does have the power to vest in the District Commissioners or local board of health authority to make laws. The provision of the Federal Constitution declaring that all legislative power shall be vested in Congress relates to the Government of the United States proper. The courts hold that Congress has authority to create boards or legislatures for the government of territory, and we have a number of instances in the history of this country where boards were created or appointed and Congress authorized them to make all laws, penal and civil, for the government of Territories, and the objection that is suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, it seems to me, does not apply to the District of Columbia. The Congress does have authority to confer upon a board or to delegate to a board or a legislative body in the District of Columbia power to legislate, power to make regulations, and particularly regulations of a sanitary character—regulations to promote public health—and it seems to me that the power contained in this bill is authorized by Congress. It seems to me that it is reasonable, and that it is the only practical way to make and enforce health laws. I regard the bill a valid and wise measure.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If I have control of the time.

Mr. MANN. The contention of the gentleman, I think, does not apply to the question at issue. There is no pretense that in this bill, so far as I have been able to find out, Congress confers any authority upon the District Commissioners to make rules and regulations.

Mr. OLCOTT. It confers in the health officer in said District power to make regulations—we prescribe a number of them—and in section 2——

Mr. MANN. What portion of the section confers that authority, vesting it in the health officer or——

Mr. OLCOTT. I will say that section 1 provides that it shall be the duty of every physician to report in writing to the health officer——

Mr. MANN. That is a regulation which we make.

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly we do; that is the law we are enacting. Then it goes on to say that it shall be the duty of every officer in charge of every hospital to make similar reports to the health officer in said District, and that he shall directly make, or cause to be made, certain microscopical examinations, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. Of course, I assume the gentleman himself is not responsible for this bill. I expect it was sent in by the District Commissioners. There is nothing in the bill that authorizes the District Commissioners to make any regulations, but there is a provision in the bill that anybody shall be fined who did not observe the regulations that they make.

Mr. OLCOTT. Let me say, under the general law governing this District, the board of health, acting under the Commissioners, are empowered to make proper regulations in all matters affecting the sanitary conditions of this city.

Mr. MANN. Well, under that power now conferred upon the Commissioners, I take it that they have the power to regulate tuberculosis. If they have, what is the object of passing this law? If they have not, then you do not confer that power upon them by this bill.

Mr. OLCOTT. They have general power to make regulations for the carrying out of all laws affecting the sanitary conditions of the District. Now, we say that certain things shall be done, which pertain to the sanitary affairs of the District, by the board of health under the law which they already have, acting in connection with their power to make regulations.

Mr. MANN. I am not familiar with this question, but I assume—if I am wrong I would like to be corrected—that under existing laws the District Commissioners have not power to make sanitary rules and regulations governing the question of tuberculosis. If they have, why do you bring this bill in?

Mr. OLCOTT. They have not the power to compel registration of tuberculosis cases as they have now for smallpox and diseases of that character. Now, this gives them power to require registration of tuberculosis cases.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, this does not give them the power. This puts upon them the duty. We say it shall be done; we do not confer any power upon them about rules and regulations in this bill. There is not a line giving the Commissioners or health officer authority, but we put a duty upon them.

Mr. OLCOTT. The health officer has general duties to perform in connection with the health of this city.

Mr. MANN. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's proposition. I would like to see a good tuberculosis law passed, but can say to him that, in my judgment, if this bill becomes a law, the first time it is tested it will be decided that Congress has passed a law that provides nothing.

Mr. OLCOTT. I would say that practically the same bill was passed by the House during the last session of the Fifty-ninth Congress. I am not saying that as an argument in favor of the bill. It has also passed the Senate this session, and I would further say, when we considered it a year ago in our committee we were quite convinced that the powers given to the health department of the District of Columbia were amply sufficient to enable the Commissioners to see that this bill and its provisions were carried out.

Mr. MANN. It is just batting the air to pass this bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is a strange situation, it seems to me, if there is not now ample authority in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to adopt regulations to prevent the spread of infectious and contagious diseases. There is a general health law that describes, I understand, some diseases as contagious and infectious. This law brings the disease of pulmonary tuberculosis, and all kind of tuberculosis, within that classification, and therefore it extends the power of the District Commissioners contained in the general law to make regulations governing this as well as other contagious and infectious diseases.

Mr. MANN. That is a statute of the imagination that I have not reached yet.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not think it requires any imagination to read it.

Mr. MANN. It would if you would read the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The section the gentleman is criticising only requires the observance of regulations adopted by the Commissioners to prevent the spread of the disease. I have no doubt, I repeat, that the Commissioners already have authority to make regulations to prevent the spread of infectious and contagious diseases. Heretofore tuberculosis has not been classified as a contagious or an infectious disease. This bill so classifies it, and, of course, legally the power the District Commissioners already have will extend to tuberculosis.

Mr. MANN. It is somewhat of a mooted question as to whether tuberculosis is a contagious or an infectious disease; and I understand it is proposed, then, to take that away from the scope of the learned men of the profession and have Congress determine a fact that the profession has not yet been able to ascertain.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Congress acts upon a fact when science has demonstrated it to be a fact.

Mr. MANN. If it be the fact, and the law say "contagious and infectious diseases," then it is a fact. It does not require additional legislation, and if it was not the fact, then Congress can not make it the fact.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The law as it exists now specifies certain diseases as contagious and infectious, and having so specified by the rule of exclusion, it leaves all diseases not specified out of the classification.

Mr. OLCOTT. I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that as a matter of fact the health department of this city has power to make regulations affecting all diseases and to see that those regulations are properly carried out and enforced for the benefit of the sanitary condition of the District. If the gentleman is only afraid that this bill can not be carried out, I hope he will not press any serious objections to it, because I know it is a good bill.

Mr. MANN. I have seen many bills that were good bills, and the courts knock out bills every day, and more, apparently, of the bills that come from the Committee on the District of Columbia than any other committee.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I doubt if the courts knock out as many bills as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] does.

Mr. MANN. If "the gentleman from Illinois" would knock out some more, the courts would not have opportunity to knock out some of them.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman inform me how many new employees will be called for by this bill?

Mr. OLCOTT. As far as I know there will not be any. I have not investigated, but I have not learned that it will be necessary to have any additional employees. There is nothing in the bill itself that provides for any. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District business.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DALZELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider bills relating to the District of Columbia.

AMENDING ACT TO EXTEND MERIDIAN PLACE NW.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I call up the bill S. 3416.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3416) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the extension of Meridian place NW.," approved January 9, 1907.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act authorizing the extension of Meridian place NW.," approved January 9, 1907, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding after the words "fifty feet," at the end of section 1 thereof, the words "along such line as said Commissioners shall deem most advantageous."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some explanation in regard to this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is very brief. There is no change except an amendment by adding the words "along such line as said Commissioners shall deem most advantageous." The bill was passed during the last Congress, and when the Commissioners came to lay out the road they found it interfered with improved property. They simply ask to amend the provision in this way, so that they can deflect the road.

Mr. SULZER. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

WIDENING OF BENNING ROAD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 4063.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4063) for the widening of Benning road, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That under and in accordance with the provisions of sections 491a to 491n, both inclusive, of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within twenty days after the dedication to the District of Columbia of 50 per cent of the land necessary for the widening of Benning road in the District of Columbia from Fifteenth street NE. to Oklahoma avenue, exclusive of the strip of land 30 feet in width acquired by the Columbia Railway Company under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, entitled "An act to authorize the extension eastwardly of the Columbia Railway," according to the street-extension plans of said District, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary to complete the widening of said road to a width of 110 feet between the limits named.

SEC. 2. That assessments shall be made by the jury as benefits, as contemplated in section 491g of the subchapter of the code hereinbefore referred to: Provided, That the total amount found to be due and awarded as damages, plus the cost and expenses of the proceedings, shall be assessed by the said jury as benefits.

SEC. 3. That the Washington Railway and Electric Company be, and is hereby, required to extend its underground conduits and operate through cars to Oklahoma avenue and place its tracks in the center of said Benning road, as widened according to the provisions of this act, and to complete the construction and equipment of said extension within one year from the date of the approval of this act.

SEC. 4. That the sum of $600, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to provide the necessary funds for the cost and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits when the same are collected, and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of all judgments and awards is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That all acts and part of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out of page 1, line 3, the words "of sections."

Strike out of page 1 entire line 4.

Strike out of page 1, line 5, the words "one n, both inclusive," and both commas.

Strike out of page 1, line 7, the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ninety."

Insert in page 2, at the end of line 6, the following provisos to section 1:

Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceedings as damages, for and in respect of the land to be condemned for said extension plus the costs and expenses of said proceeding, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits: And provided further, That nothing in said subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of said code shall be construed to authorize the jury to assess less than the aggregate amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land to be condemned and the costs and expenses of the proceeding hereunder."

Strike out of page 2 all of lines 7 to 25, both inclusive.

Strike out of page 3 lines 1 to 5, both inclusive.

Insert in lieu of the lines stricken out by the last two amendments the following to stand as section 2 of the bill:

"SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated from the revenues of the District of Columbia an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages; to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by inserting an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 869 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, be amended by striking out the words "in the cities of Washington and Georgetown" and the words in said act "or within said District, within 1 mile of the boundaries of said cities."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I reserve the point of order upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee until I know what it is.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will explain the object and purpose of this amendment. In order to do so, I will read the section in the code which this is intended to amend. Section 869 of the code reads:

SEC. 869. Pool selling, etc.: It shall be unlawful for any person or association of persons in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, or within said District within 1 mile of the boundaries of said cities, to bet, gamble, or make books or pools on the result of any trotting race or running race of horses, or boat race, or race of any kind, or on any election, or any contest of any kind, or game of baseball. Any person or association of persons violating the provisions of this section shall be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not more than ninety days, or both.

Under a decision of the court it has been held, as I understand it and as I am informed, that under this section of the code it does not include Benning race track and does not make it, therefore, unlawful for any person to bet on a horse race at Benning; but by striking out the words "in the cities of Washington and Georgetown" and "or within said District within 1 mile of the boundaries of said cities," it reads as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any person or association of persons in the District of Columbia to bet, gamble, or make books or pools on the result of any trotting race or running race of horses, or boat race, or race of any kind, or on any election, or any contest of any kind, or game of baseball.

The object of the amendment is simply to extend the anti-gambling laws of the District to the entire District, so as to make gambling and betting unlawful in every part of the District. Under the language of the section as it is in the act, it is within 1 mile of the limits of the city of Washington, and 1 mile does not extend to the limits of the District of Columbia, and therefore the courts are without jurisdiction to enforce the law.

Mr. LANDIS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if the gentleman from Illinois had accepted the proposition offered from the gentleman from New York, would that wager have been a violation of the code?

Mr. SIMS. Well, I am not undertaking to define what wagers are. But, speaking of the gentleman from New York, this in part is for the benefit of some gentlemen from New York. We know, as it has been stated, that New York has been hard up for money for a long time, so much so that a panic was the result, and the Secretary of the Treasury had to make very large deposits in the banks of the city of New York to prevent the panic from being prolonged. It is suggested that these gentlemen from New York are fleeced and robbed by the clerks and employees of the Government and citizens of the District, including statesmen, by winning their money, and as an additional reason for the passage of this bill I want to prevent this local crowd from fleecing the citizens of New York and sending them home impoverished.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will permit me, I reserved the point of order for the purpose of ascertaining what the amendment the gentleman offered really meant, what its significance really was. I find that it is to extend the antigambling law to the race tracks at Benning, where, I suppose, it ought to apply if it applies anywhere. The amendment is doubtless subject to a point of order. It is somewhat illogical to amend the bill in this way, but I do not propose to stand in the way of the enactment of proper antigambling laws for the District. I believe in that kind of legislation, and therefore I withdraw the point of order and will support the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. I was satisfied that the gentleman from Indiana would do that as soon as he knew what the purpose of the amendment was.

Mr. KAHN. I desire to make the point of order, and to say in that connection that this matter has not been before our committee in such a way that the committee could take action on it. It is an unusual way to come in here and offer an amendment on a bill of this character, and I submit it is of sufficiently serious importance to be considered by the committee. I make the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. I ask the gentleman to withhold it for a moment. He has referred to the action of the District Committee, and I should like to make a statement about that.

Mr. KAHN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. A bill of this kind, except broader, and going to the extent of making it unlawful to make wagering contracts on futures, was introduced and went to the District Committee. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and it was well, thoroughly, and fully considered, and I offered this provision as a substitute for the bill, and it was voted down. Then, after consideration of the bill, which included this and other matters, the bill of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] was tabled. So the subject-matter has been considered by the committee, but I am sorry to be compelled to say that it did not meet with the approval of a majority of those present.

I hope the gentleman from California will not make the point of order, because here is a law which plainly says it shall be unlawful to lay wagers and make bets within 1 mile of the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, leaving all the rest of the District of Columbia without protection from a law which is thought to be necessary within the city. Now, if the existing law is a good law a little beyond the limits of these cities, why is it not a good law a little farther, to the limits of the District of Columbia, which does not exceed 10 miles square. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this matter was brought up in the committee for the first time at the last meeting. As I remember, it was not fully considered. It is a very important matter. I am just as anxious as the gentleman is to limit gambling. I have never laid a wager on a horse race in my life, but I submit that this is not the proper way to legislate, and I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DALZELL). This is a bill, as the Chair understands, to widen the Benning road. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee goes to the prohibition of gambling. The Chair thinks the amendment is not germane to the purpose of the bill, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. As there is nothing objectionable in the bill, and as it is a good bill, I will ask for a vote on it.

Mr. MADDEN. Did I understand the Chair to sustain the point of order on this amendment?

Mr. SIMS. On the amendment I offered, yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I think inasmuch as this bill appropriates an indefinite sum of money out of the treasury of the District of Columbia, it is exceeding its authority when it recommends this appropriation. It seems to me that under the rule the appropriation is not in order. I did not make the point of order against the section of the bill in time to have it considered from that standpoint, but I believe there should be an investigation of the amount of money required to meet the expenditure provided for in this bill before an appropriation is made. I beg to suggest that page 3, section 2, line 18, after the word "hereby," ought to be amended so as to substitute the word "authorized" for the word "appropriated." I offer that amendment.

Mr. SIMS. I do not care anything about the language of the amendment, provided its purpose is accomplished.

Mr. MADDEN. The purpose is to give authority for the appropriation, rather than to make the appropriation.

Mr. SIMS. I will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois repeat his amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. My amendment is to substitute the word "authorized" for the word "appropriated," on line 18, page 3.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 18, page 3, strike out the word "appropriated" and insert the word "authorized," so it will read "there is hereby authorized."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Should not it be "authorized to be expended?"

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I will modify it to that extent.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "appropriated" and insert the words "authorized to be expended," so it will read "there is hereby authorized to be expended."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee, if he wants to stop gambling, why he wants to widen this road so that the gamblers can get to it so easily?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Tennessee ought to answer the question of the gentleman from Missouri. I want to ask if this is in the interest of the race track at Benning?

Mr. SIMS. I certainly did not think so, and I should be glad to read to the gentleman from Illinois the following resolution from the East End Suburban Association. It is as follows:

EAST END SUBURBAN CITIZENS' ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1908.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I take pleasure in notifying you that the following resolution, introduced by me at the last regular meeting of our association, held the 12th instant, was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the thanks of this association are due, and the same are hereby tendered, the Hon. THETUS W. SIMS, of Tennessee, for his efforts in behalf of the passage of the bill (H. R. 4063) for the widening of Benning road."

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Very truly, yours, JAMES M. WOOD, Secretary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offered was to prevent betting, not horse racing. You can go out and see all the horses run you want to and spend all the time you want to there and not lose your money. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee assumes that. The gentleman knows very well that Benning would not last very long if they were not allowed to bet. Do I understand that the bill is being passed to help the race track, regardless of betting?

Mr. SIMS. It has no reference to the race track. People going out there take the cars, autos, or carriages and get back the best way they can.

Mr. MANN. Is there a settlement there where people take the cars for their own use?

Mr. SIMS. I have just read the gentleman a letter. Perhaps I ought not to have read it, as the resolution was addressed to me.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is entitled to all the thanks and flowers that are thrown out to him.

Mr. SIMS. I would not have put it in the RECORD if I had not been called upon to show the necessity of this widening.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to say that there was no objection to this bill as it now stands?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. MADDEN. This matter of betting is like the question of the bedbug; there is not so much objection to the bedbug, but it is the infernal method he has of getting a living. [Laughter.] Will not this afford the same opportunity to the gamblers that it will afford to anyone else?

Mr. SIMS. No; you have to go across the Anacostia River to get to Benning—or at least that used to be the way. This is for the improvement this side of Benning. I have no map here to show gentlemen how far this side of Benning, but it has no effect on Benning as a race track. I ask for a vote.

Mr. MADDEN. What effect does it have?

Mr. SIMS. It is for the benefit of the people who use the road.

Mr. MADDEN. What effect does it have on them?

Mr. SIMS. The road now is not sufficiently wide.

Mr. MADDEN. Is that because the gamblers who go out there have to have a wider road than anybody else?

Mr. SIMS. No; the people out there do not gamble; that is reserved for visiting gentlemen and statesmen. [Laughter.]

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

EXTENSION OF NINTH STREET NW.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (H. R. 16269) authorizing the extension of Ninth street NW.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within ninety days after the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of Ninth street NW. from Barry place to Euclid street, with a width of 50 feet along such line as said Commissioners may deem most advantageous: Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceeding as damages, for and in respect of the land to be condemned for said extension plus the costs and expenses of said proceeding, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits: And provided further, That nothing in said subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of said code shall be construed to authorize the jury to assess less than the aggregate amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land to be condemned and the costs and expenses of the proceeding hereunder.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, one-half from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the United States in equal part.

The Clerk read the following committee amendments:

Strike out of page 2, line 8, the comma and the word "one-half."

Strike out of page 2, line 9, the words "and one-half."

Strike out of page 2 the entire line 10.

Strike out of page 2, lines 16 and 17, the words "and the United States in equal part" and insert a period after the word "Columbia" in line 16.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 11, I move to strike out the word "appropriated" and insert the words "authorized to be expended."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 11, strike out the word "appropriated" and insert the words "authorized to be expended."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to any of the amendments or to the bill, but I am prompted to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan whether he has investigated the feasibility of enacting a general law authorizing citizens who are interested in the widening of streets to petition the District Commissioners for authority to go into the courts to have land condemned for street purposes under limitations requiring the assessment of benefits of lands that are benefited and awarding damages for property taken for the use of public streets.

I have wondered if it is not practicable to have that kind of a system so as to relieve the Congress from the necessity of passing upon every proposition to widen a street or alley in the city. Here are now six or eight bills pending to-day for that purpose. Has such a scheme ever been considered by the District Committee?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the gentleman will remember that during the last three or four Congresses there has been a good deal of discussion about the question of opening the streets in the city of Washington, and it was during the last Congress that a special committee was appointed from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and that committee brought in a bill by which streets are now opened, and each of these street-opening cases specifically follows that law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; but there can not be a street opened or widened in the city even for a block——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Without an act of Congress approved by the President. It seems to me that the law might be made so as to be not self-executing, but to confer authority under certain conditions upon the District Commissioners or some other body to authorize proceedings for the opening of a street upon petition signed by a certain number of property owners, or something like that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am inclined to think that if we took the time to read the various sections of the law which was passed, the gentleman would think that we had conferred as much authority on the Commissioners as we ought to.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he knows of any city in this country in which streets could be widened or extended without definite action of the common council in those cities?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know of any, but I think it would not be bad legislation to confer upon the District Commissioners some of the functions usually exercised by the common councils of municipalities, and probably that power would be more wisely and safely administered or executed, under proper safeguards, than it is by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. DRISCOLL. This Congress is the common council of the District.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, I understand that.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And I would like to ask the gentleman if he would want to waive any of the powers now possessed by Congress with reference to this?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Most certainly, if there is any feasible or practical way to relieve the Congress from a good deal of the burden of this detail legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I can assure the gentleman that the District Committee would be glad also to be relieved as much as possible of that work, but it does seem to me, under the law passed last Congress, and which is spoken of in all of these bills that we have introduced here, perhaps we have simplified it just as far as we are justified in doing it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is possible. I have not studied the matter.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, having been a member of the street-opening board and as a commissioner for about seven years in the city of New York, I am more or less acquainted with the matters of street opening.

I claim that Congress should have a voice in all street openings in the city of Washington. The beauty and grace of our city depends largely upon how our streets are opened. The same should have every care, and the original layout or plan of the city that was so well considered originally should be, as far as possible, carried out.

I claim that it is the most beautiful city of our country, because it is becoming the city of culture and learning and will be largely the city of retired wealth—the Paris of America—and as a factor of safety to see that the streets and avenues are well considered and that no selfish purpose creeps into the same, it should have the watchful eye of Congress as a factor to that safety. Congress should always have a voice in the direction of it. That may take up some of our time, but that time is well spent. I take pleasure in commending the good work of the present Commission of the District in having presented to the District Committee such street openings and widenings, which had every evidence of being well considered for the beauty and utility of the city. There was no evidence of any selfish motive that sometimes creeps in in the opening of streets simply for the purpose of real-estate speculations. There is no burden harder to bear to the property owners than the assessment for street openings if the same is not actually needed. It is like borrowing money and paying interest on it when you have no use for it. So perfect your map and consider all the physical and topographical elements in your new District. Beauty and utility should guide the pencil, compass, and square of the engineer; then you can improve your streets and avenues when needed, and real-estate interests, which are so largely a question in your city, would be well calculated and investments intelligently made. These locations may be good, but if poorly laid out and considered, they are largely lessened in value, and because of such the city will lose by way of less taxation and realty damage.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EXTENSION OF GIRARD STREET NW.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 17303) authorizing the extension of Girard street NW. from its western terminus to Fifteenth street NW., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within ninety days after the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of Girard street from its western terminus to Fifteenth street, with a width of 60 feet, more or less, upon such lines as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may deem most advantageous to the abutting property: Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceeding as damages for and in respect of the land to be condemned for said extension shall be assessed by the jury as benefits: And provided further, That nothing in said subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of said code shall be construed to authorize the jury to assess less than the aggregate amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land to be condemned and the costs and expenses of the proceeding hereunder.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, one-half from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the United States in equal parts.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out of page 2, line 8, the comma and the word "one-half."
Strike out of page 2, line 9, the words "and one-half."
Strike out of page 2 the whole of line 10.
Strike out of page 2, lines 16 and 17, the words "and the United States in equal parts."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, strike out the word "appropriated" and insert in lieu thereof the words "authorized to be expended."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EXTENSION OF NEW YORK AVENUE TO BLADENSBURG ROAD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 17297.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17297) authorizing the extension of New York avenue from its present terminus near Fourth street NE. to the Bladensburg road.

Be it enacted, etc., That, under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within ninety days after the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of New York avenue from its present eastern terminus near Fourth street NE. to the proposed line of Montana avenue, and from Montana avenue to the Bladensburg road, upon such lines as the Commissioners may deem best for the public interests, with a width of 130 feet: Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceeding as damages for and in respect of the land to be condemned for said extension shall be assessed by the jury as benefits: And provided further, That nothing in said subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of said code shall be construed to authorize the jury to assess less than the aggregate amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land to be condemned and the costs and expenses of the proceeding hereunder.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, one-half from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the United States in equal parts.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out of page 2, line 11, the comma and the word "one-half."
Strike out of page 2, line 12, the words "and one-half."
Strike out of page 2 the entire line 13.
Strike out of page 2, lines 19 and 20, the words "and the United States in equal parts," and insert a period after the word "Columbia" in line 19.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move, page 2, line 13, to strike the word "appropriated" and insert the words "authorized to be expended."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 13, strike the word "appropriated" and insert the words "authorized to be expended."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills relating to the District of Columbia and had instructed him to report the same, some with and some without amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bills as amended do pass.

EXTENSION OF MERIDIAN PLACE.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was the bill (S. 3416) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the extension of Meridian place NW.," approved January 9, 1907.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

WIDENING OF BENNING ROAD.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was the bill (H. R. 4063) for the widening of Benning road, and for other purposes, with amendments.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, has the bill been read the third time?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, after it is ordered to a third reading I wish to make a motion.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. SIMS. Between the third reading and the passage of the bill I wish to make a motion.

The bill was read a third time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report back the bill with the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the instructions in the nature of an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 869 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, be amended by striking out the words "in the cities of Washington and Georgetown" and the words in said act "or within said District within 1 mile of the boundaries of said cities."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to recommit the bill with the instructions just read.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the "noes" seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SIMS) there were—ayes 70, noes 4.

So the bill was ordered to be recommitted.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, I ask that it be called up as amended and passed.

The SPEAKER. Well, the bill has been recommitted to the committee.

Mr. SIMS. With a direction for them to make a report. I suppose the committee is ready to make the report and have a vote.

The SPEAKER. There would have to be a report from the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understood, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman desired——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not put the word "forthwith" in his motion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I could not just understand what the gentleman from Tennessee wanted to have done.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the word "forthwith" be added to the motion.

Mr. KAHN. I make the point of order——

The SPEAKER. What is the suggestion of the gentleman?

Mr. SIMS. That the committee report back "forthwith."

The SPEAKER. But the motion has already been agreed to; it is not subject to amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Then the parliamentary situation is that the bill must be reported back by the committee.

The SPEAKER. That is the parliamentary situation, as the Chair understands it.

EXTENSION OF NINTH STREET NW.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was the bill (H. R. 16269) authorizing the extension of Ninth street NW., with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF GIRARD STREET NW.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was the bill (H. R. 17303) authorizing the extension of Girard street NW.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF NEW YORK AVENUE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was the bill (H. R. 17297) authorizing the extension of New York avenue from its present terminus near Fourth street NE. to the Bladensburg road, with amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

WIDENING OF BENNING ROAD.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill H. R. 4063, a bill for the widening of Benning road, and for other purposes, was recommitted to the District Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill H. R. 4063 was recommitted to the District Committee a few moments ago. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit in the same language, and adding thereto that the committee report forthwith.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. There is a question as to whether the gentleman's motion to reconsider was in order or not, but there was no point of order made and the motion was agreed to, and then the motion was adopted as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to ask a parliamentary question. What is the present status of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The present status is that the bill referred to awaits a report from the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. One further question. I would like to ask if "forthwith" means here what it ordinarily means—within twenty-four hours?

Mr. SIMS. It means at once.

The SPEAKER. It means forthwith. It requires, as the Chair understands it, a report of the bill from the committee, under instruction of the House.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House and in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman must first report the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PERKINS. Suppose the chairman of the committee does not report the bill; then what happens?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not decide that question, because the chairman of the committee would be acting under the order of the House, and it is not a supposable case.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I desire to report the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan reports a bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4063) for the widening of Benning road, and for other purposes.

With amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the amendment read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk at the Speaker's table reminds the Chair that, notwithstanding the bill has been engrossed and read a third time, as it is now it will have to be engrossed and read a third time, and, without objection, it will be considered as engrossed and read a third time.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. SIMS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Michigan, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the various other bills were passed was laid on the table.

EXTENDING MINING LAWS.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 206.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 206) to extend the provisions of the mining laws of the United States to certain lands situated in the Bitter Root Valley, State of Montana, above the mouth of the Lo Lo fork of the Bitter Root River.

Be it enacted, etc., That all the provisions of the present mining laws of the United States are hereby extended and made applicable to the undisposed of lands in the Bitter Root Valley, State of Montana, above the mouth of the Lo Lo fork of the Bitter Root River, designated in the act of June 5, 1872: Provided, That all mining locations and entries heretofore made or attempted to be made upon said lands shall be determined by the Department of the Interior as if said lands had been subject to mineral location and entry at the time such locations and entries were made or attempted to be made: And provided further, That this act shall not be applicable to lands withdrawn for administration sites for use of the Forest Service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman and I talked about this bill. I have not my notes with me, but this bill by the report is stated to have been referred to the Secretary of the Interior, and the report made by the gentleman to the House contains a letter from the Secretary of the Interior indorsing the bill; but the bill which was referred to the Secretary of the Interior was not the bill which is now before the House in perhaps one of its most vital features. There was inserted in the bill this provision, which was not in the bill as referred to the Secretary of the Interior:

Provided, That all mining locations and entries heretofore made or attempted to be made upon said lands shall be determined by the Department of the Interior as if said lands had been subject to mineral location and entry at the time such locations and entries were made or attempted to be made.

That, of course, gives a preference right to certain people who in the past have made an effort to obtain mineral rights in these lands. That provision was not submitted to the Secretary of the Interior. Now, will the gentleman tell us why that should go into the bill?

Mr. PRAY. As to the inquiry made, I understand that all the features of this bill were passed upon favorably by the Secretary of the Interior. It was referred to him from the Senate. The Senate committee referred the bill to the Secretary of the Interior, and he made a favorable report. It is my understanding that all these provisions were referred to him. If this one was omitted from his letter, it must have been an oversight.

Mr. MANN. It was not in the bill referred to him at all.

Mr. PRAY. It was not?

Mr. MANN. No. He recommended the second proviso which is in the bill, but did not recommend the first provision, nor was the first proviso in the bill which was sent to the Secretary of the Interior. Now, then, there may be good reason for putting it in. I do not say it is objectionable; but where a bill is introduced pertaining to such matters and is sent to the Secretary of the Interior and a very vital feature is not included in the bill, there ought to be some reason given for it.

Mr. PRAY. This is a very important proviso, and it should be in. As a matter of fact, and in explanation of it, I would say to the gentleman that a number of mineral entries have been made on these lands and a great many valuable improvements have been placed thereon, and that provision was to enable the entrymen who have made these mining locations there to protect themselves and to protect their interests by giving them a preference right over others who had not made entries and improvements, but who would be likely to do so when the lands are opened to this character of entry.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has investigated this matter and knows about it. I will ask him a question about it: This relates to extending the mineral laws, as I understand, over a certain portion of an old Indian reservation which has been put into the public domain?

Mr. PRAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN (continuing). And the people supposed the mineral laws did extend over the reservation, and some of them made efforts to make mining claims and mineral rights on the land, and the Department subsequently held that they were not entitled to make these claims, because the mineral laws did not extend to this reservation.

Mr. PRAY. That is about the case.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman prepared to say that these people upon these reservations, who are now claiming the mineral rights, have endeavored to acquire those rights in good faith?

Mr. PRAY. Yes, sir. I would say to the gentleman that the facts are slightly different, however; that by the acts of 1872 and 1874, the latter being supplementary to the former law, but practically along the same line, fifteen townships above the mouth of Lo Lo fork of the Bitter Root River were opened to homestead settlement. Mineral entries were subsequently located along the side of the mountain there, and the Department had been allowing these entries to be made, and for a time patents were regularly issued. But later on the question as to the right to make mineral entry was carried to the Secretary of the Interior, and it was decided that they were not open to such entry, and it is in order to protect these entrymen that the enactment of this law is now sought, so as to enable them to protect their entries and improvements and receive their patents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

DAM ACROSS SAVANNAH RIVER.

The Speaker laid before the House the bill (H. R. 16621) to extend the time for the construction of a dam across Savannah River at Cherokee Shoals, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read and agreed to.

PROPOSED LABOR LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the indulgence of the House for a moment, to state that a few days ago a committee representing the Federation of Labor called upon the Speaker and presented a memorial. In connection with the presentation of that memorial there were brief remarks by the Speaker and by one member of the committee. The Chair will ask unanimous consent that the memorial and the remarks be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, what is this about?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated what it is about, but will state again. A few days ago a committee that purported to be from the Federation of Labor, and no doubt was, called upon the Speaker of the House and presented a memorial.

Mr. SULZER. Is this in regard to the labor leaders who called on you?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has no objection, and if there be no objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

INTERVIEW BETWEEN HON. J. G. CANNON, SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AND A COMMITTEE OF SEVEN, REPRESENTING NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE AND LABOR UNIONS AND ORGANIZATIONS OF FARMERS.

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., Thursday, March 19, 1908, 4 p. m.

Present: Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, the Speaker; Mr. Samuel Gompers, Mr. W. R. Fairley, Mr. Joseph F. Valentine, Mr. T. C. Parsons, Mr. P. J. McArdle, Mr. C. M. Barnett, and Mr. W. D. Mahon.

Mr. GOMPERS. Mr. Speaker, we realize that your time is very much occupied, and it is therefore not necessary to prolong the preliminaries or take more of your time than is required to present to you the matter that I referred to in my note of yesterday.

The conference held here in the last few days has directed us, as a committee, to present its views to you as the representative of the majority party in power. What we have to say has been reduced to writing, and if you consent, Mr. Fairley, the chairman of the committee, will read it. It will take only about twenty minutes to read it.

The SPEAKER. Very well; have you a copy that you will leave?

Mr. GOMPERS. We will leave the original.

The SPEAKER. All right. Do not stand up, Mr. Fairley, unless you want to.

Mr. FAIRLEY. You will understand better. My English is not the best in the world.

The SPEAKER. If your legs are good, I guess your English will be all right.

Mr. Fairley read the memorial, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1908.

We, the official representatives of the national and international trade and labor unions and organization of farmers, in national conference assembled, in the District of Columbia, for the purpose of considering and taking action deemed necessary to meet the situation in which the working people of our country are placed by recent decisions of the courts, now appear before Congress to voice the earnest and emphatic protest of the workers of the country against the indifference, if not actual hostility, which Congress has shown toward the reasonable and righteous measures proposed by the workers for the safeguarding of their rights and interests.

In the name of labor we now urge upon Congress the necessity for immediate action for relief from the most grave and momentous situation which has ever confronted the working people of this country. This crisis has been brought about by the application by the Supreme Court of the United States of the Sherman antitrust law to the workers both organized and in their individual capacity.

Labor and the people generally look askance at the invasion of the court upon the prerogatives of the law-making and executive departments of our Government.

The workers feel that Congress itself must share our chagrin and sense of injustice when the courts exhibit an utter disregard for the real intent and purpose of laws enacted to safeguard and protect the workers in the exercise of their normal activities. There is something ominous in the ironic manner in which the courts guarantee to workers:

The "right" to be maimed and killed without liability to the employer;

The "right" to be discharged for belonging to a union;

The "right" to work as many hours as employers please and under any conditions which they may impose.

Labor is justly indignant at the bestowal or guaranteeing of these worthless and academic "rights" by the courts, which in the same breath deny and forbid to the workers the practical and necessary protection of laws which define and safeguard their rights and liberties and the exercise of them individually or in association.

The most recent perversion of the intent of a law by the judiciary has been the Supreme Court decision in the hatters' case, by which the Sherman antitrust law has been made to apply to labor, although it was an accepted fact that Congress did not intend the law to so apply and might even have specifically exempted labor but for the fear that the Supreme Court might construe such an affirmative provision to be unconstitutional.

The workers earnestly urge Congress to cooperate with them in the upbuilding and educating of a public sentiment which will confine the judiciary to its proper function, which is certainly not that of placing a construction upon a law the very opposite of the plain intent of Congress, thus rendering worthless even the very moderate efforts which Congress has so far put forth to define the status of the most important, numerous, and patriotic of our people—the wage-workers, the producers of all wealth.

We contend that equity, power, and jurisdiction, discretionary government by the judiciary for well-defined purposes and within specific limitations, granted to the courts by the Constitution, has been so extended that it is invading the field of government by law and endangering individual liberty.

As government by equity, personal government, advances, republican government, government by law, recedes.

We favor enactment of laws which shall restrict the jurisdiction of courts of equity to property and property rights and shall so define property and property rights that neither directly nor indirectly shall there be held to be any property or property rights in the labor or labor power of any person or persons.

The feeling of restless apprehension with which the workers view the apathy of Congress is accentuated by the recent decision of the Supreme Court.

By the wrongful application of the injunction by the lower courts the workers have been forbidden the right of free press and free speech, and the Supreme Court in the hatters' case, while not directly prohibiting the exercise of these rights, yet so applies the Sherman law to labor that acts involving the use of free press and free speech, and hitherto assumed to be lawful, now become evidence upon which triple damages may be collected and fine and imprisonment added as a part of the penalty.

Indeed, the decision goes so far as to hold the agreements of unions with employers to maintain industrial peace to be "conspiracies" and the evidence of unlawful combinations in restraint of trade and commerce, thus effectually throttling labor by penalizing as criminal the exercise of its normal, peaceful rights and activities. The fact that these acts are, in reality, making for the uplift and the betterment of civilization as a whole does not seem to be understood or appreciated by the courts. The workers hope for a broader and more intelligent appreciation from Congress.

It is not necessary here to enter into a detailed review of this decision.

The workers ask from Congress the relief which it alone can give from the injustice which will surely result from the literal enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law as interpreted by this decision. The speedy enactment of labor's proposed amendment to the Sherman antitrust law will do much to restore the rights from which the toilers have been shorn.

We submit for consideration, and trust the same will be enacted, two provisions amendatory of the Sherman antitrust law, which originally were a part of the bill during the stages of its consideration by the Senate and before its final passage, and which are substantially as follows:

That nothing in said act (Sherman antitrust law) or in this act is intended, nor shall any provision thereof hereafter be enforced, so as to apply to organizations or associations not for profit and without capital stock, nor to the members of such organizations or associations.

That nothing in said act (Sherman antitrust law) or in this act is intended, nor shall any provision thereof hereafter be enforced so as to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations among persons engaged in agriculture or horticulture, made with a view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products.

It is clearly an unwarranted assumption on the part of the courts or others to place the voluntary associations of the workers in the same category as trusts and corporations owning stock and organized for profit.

On the one hand we have the trusts and corporations dealing with purely material things and mostly with the inanimate products of labor; on the other hand there are workers, whose labor power is part of their very life and beings and which can not be differentiated from their ownership in and of themselves.

The effort to categorically place the workers in the same position as those who deal in the products of labor of others is the failure to discern between things and man.

It is often flippantly averred that labor is a commodity, but modern civilization has clearly and sharply drawn the line between a bushel of coal, a side of pork, and the soul of a human, breathing, living man.

The enactment of the legislation which we ask will tend to so define and safeguard the rights of the workers of to-day and those who will come after them that they may hope to continue to enjoy the blessings of a free country as intended by the founders of our Government.

In the relief asked for in the proposed amendment to the Sherman antitrust law which we present to Congress, labor asks for no special privileges and no exemption from the treatment which any law-abiding citizen might hope to receive in a free country.

Indeed, the present Parliament of Great Britain, at its session in December, 1906, enacted into law what is known as the "trades dispute act." It is brief, and we therefore quote its provisions in full:

"1. It shall be lawful for any person or persons, acting either on their own behalf or on behalf of a trade union or other association of individuals, registered or unregistered, in contemplation of or during the continuance of any trade dispute, to attend for any of the following purposes at or near a house or place where a person resides or works or carries on his business or happens to be—

"(1) For the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information;

"(2) For the purpose of peacefully persuading any person to work or abstain from working.

"2. An agreement or combination by two or more persons to do or procure to be done any act in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute shall not be ground for an action if such act when committed by one person would not be ground for an action.

"3. An action shall not be brought against a trade union or other association aforesaid for the recovery of damage sustained by any person or persons by reason of the action of a member or members of such trade union or other association aforesaid."

We submit that if such relief from the onerous conditions brought about by the Taff-Vale decision of the highest court of Great Britain can be enacted by a monarchial government, there ought to be no hesitancy in conceding it in our own Republic.

The unions of labor aim to improve the standard of life; to uproot ignorance and foster education; to install character, manhood, and an independent spirit among our people; to bring about a recognition of the interdependence of man upon his fellow-man. We aim to establish a normal workday; to take the children from the factory and workshop and give them the opportunity of the schools, the home, and the playground. In a word, our unions strive to lighten toil, educate their members, make their homes more cheerful, and in every way contribute an earnest effort toward making life the better worth living. To achieve these praiseworthy ends we believe that all honorable and lawful means are justifiable and commendable and should receive the sympathetic support of every right-thinking American.

Labor asks only for justice. It asks that it be not victimized and penalized under laws never intended to apply to it.

We hope for a prompt recognition on the part of Congress of the wage workers' very reasonable and moderate insistence in this important matter.

In addition, the other most important measures which labor urges are:

The bill to regulate and limit the issuance of injunctions—Pearre bill.

Employers' liability bill.

The bill extending the application of the eight-hour law to all Government employees and those employed upon work for the Government, whether by contractors or subcontractors.

There are other measures pending which we regard as important, but we feel especially justified in urging the passage of those mentioned, because they have been before Congress for several sessions and upon which extended hearings have been had before committees, every interest concerned having had ample opportunity to present arguments, and there is no good reason why action should longer be deferred by Congress.

We come to Congress hoping for a prompt and adequate remedy for the grievances of which we justly complain. The psychological moment has arrived for a total change of governmental policy toward the workers; to permit it to pass may be to invite disaster even to our national life.

In this frank statement of its grievances the attitude of labor should not be misinterpreted, nor should it be held as wanting in respect for our highest lawmaking body.

That the workers, while smarting under a most keen sense of injustice and neglect, turn first to Congress for a remedy, shows how greatly they still trust in the power and willingness of this branch of the Government to restore, safeguard, and protect their rights.

Labor proposes to aid in this work by exercising its utmost political and industrial activity, its moral and social influence, in order that the interests of the masses may be represented in Congress by those who are pledged to do justice to labor and to all our people, not to promote the special interests of those who would injure the whole body politic by crippling and enslaving the toilers.

Labor is most hopeful that Congress will appreciate the gravity of the situation which we have endeavored to present. The workers trust that Congress will shake off the apathy which has heretofore characterized it on this subject and perform a beneficent social service for the whole people by enacting such legislation as will restore confidence among the workers that their needs as law-abiding citizens will be heeded.

Only by such action will a crisis be averted. There must be something more substantial than fair promises. The present feeling of widespread apprehension among the workers of our country becomes more acute every day. The desire for decisive action becomes more intense.

While it is true that there is no legal appeal from a Supreme Court decision, yet we believe Congress can and should enact such further legislation as will more clearly define the rights and liberties of the workers.

Should labor's petition for the righting of the wrongs which have been imposed upon it and the remedying of injustices done to it pass unheeded by Congress and those who administer the affairs of our Government, then upon those who have failed to do their duty and not upon the workers will rest the responsibility.

The labor union is a natural, rational, and inevitable outgrowth of our modern industrial conditions. To outlaw the union in the exercise of its normal activities for the protection and advancement of labor and the advancement of society in general is to do a tremendous injury to all people.

The repression of right and natural activities is bound to finally break forth in violent form of protest, especially among the more ignorant of the people, who will feel great bitterness if denied the consideration they have a right to expect at the hands of Congress.

As the authorized representatives of the organized wage-earners of our country, we present to you in the most conservative and earnest manner that protest against the wrongs which they have to endure, and some of the rights and relief to which they are justly entitled. There is not a wrong for which we seek redress, or a right to which we aspire which does not or will not be equally shared by all the workers—by all the people.

While no Member of Congress or party can evade or avoid his or their own individual or party share of responsibility, we aver that the party in power must, and will, by labor and its sympathizers, be held primarily responsible for the failure to give the prompt, full, and effective Congressional relief we know to be within its power.

We come to you not as political partisans, whether Republican, Democratic, or other, but as representatives of the wageworkers of our country, whose rights, interests, and welfare have been jeopardized and flagrantly, woefully disregarded and neglected. We come to you because you are responsible for legislation or the failure of legislation. If these, or new questions, are unsettled and any other political party becomes responsible for legislation, we shall press home upon its Representatives and hold them responsible, equally as we now must hold you.

(Mr. Fairley submits memorial to the Speaker.)

Mr. GOMPERS. The names are not written there. They are on the original document, and this is typewritten for better legibility.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen, is that all?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen, this communication will, under the rules of the House, be referred to the appropriate committee for consideration.

I have listened with much interest to the reading of your communication, and I now speak as a Representative, and not for Congress. The House of Representatives, embracing almost 400 Members, is one of the coordinate branches of Congress, and, of course, is represented substantially by two great party organizations. As one Representative, I realize fully that this is a Government through parties and party responsibility, the parties changing from time to time as the people may determine at the ballot box.

It is proper for me to say, touching your reference to the employers' liability law recently construed by the court of last resort, which under our form of government is supreme in the construction of the law, that I am satisfied that the sentiment of the House is favorable to the enactment of such an employers' liability bill, in conformity with the opinion of the court, as will give a remedy to employees for injuries, taking care, so far as Congress or the House may be able to do so, that the law to be enacted is so framed that it will be sustained by the courts. I can not tell just when, because with respect to that and to the 15,000 other bills that have already been introduced and referred to the appropriate committees, the House, as is the case with any other deliberative body in the orderly transaction of business, must await the action of the committees. And yet I apprehend and am convinced that after full consideration there will be action on that bill by the House and possibly or probably, as far as I know and believe, by the Senate.

There is another bill concerning which I have received many letters and memorials from various localities throughout the country, known as the "Clapp bill," a bill that pertains to the act that was passed that prevented the issuance of free transportation, with an exception as to railway employees. The Clapp bill has passed the Senate and is now pending before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and, I am informed, is being considered by that committee. I am satisfied, from the best information I can obtain, that it will in the near future be reported to the House, and I have every reason to believe that on consideration it will be passed by the House.

You refer to many matters in your protest, prepared with much care and entitled to candid and courteous and searching investigation. I can not discuss the various matters as a Representative with you at this time. But I will make one remark, and I will make it for myself: That as to our form of government, with the three coordinate branches, executive, legislative, and judicial, I believe it to be the best form of government on earth. If somebody having the attributes of Deity, with all wisdom and power, could act, then there would be a better government than any that human beings could devise. But it has been so ordered, under God's law in the beginning, that the human race must work out its own salvation, and in a government of the people, in the last analysis the people control. And in the fullness of time, if there be a just public sentiment, all laws, constitutional or statutory, will conform to that just sentiment, and ought to conform to it.

Unfortunately all men are not wise, and in the struggle for subsistence, law is necessary to curb those who would unfairly profit at the expense of others. It is a long road. When you and I are dead and forgotten, in this government of the people, new or additional legislation, with new and changed conditions, will no doubt be necessary. I am getting to be now an old man—past three score and ten—but as for me, while I appreciate the necessity on the part of all our people of contributing to a just public sentiment, as one individual I believe that after discussion, full, free, and frank, no law should be enacted or can abide that does not, like the grace of God, cover every individual in the Republic, whether he be wise or unwise, whether he be rich or poor, whether he labor in the countinghouse or sail upon the sea, or toil in the mine or factory.

I am very glad indeed to have met you, gentlemen.

Mr. GOMPERS. May I say just a word in connection with this matter?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GOMPERS. The decision of the Supreme Court, recently handed down in the hatters' case, the case of Dietrich Loewe and others against Martin Lawler and others, commonly known as the "hatters' case," establishes a rule of law that the very agreements that our organizations made with the employers are in unlawful restraint of trade and become amenable to all the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law; that these agreements with employers to maintain industrial peace, or to reestablish peace with employers of workmen after any rupture has occurred, are evidences of conspiracies and unlawful restraint of trade, making not only the men who may be engaged in the trade disputes, in the organizations, and the officers of the organizations themselves, amenable to the law, prescribing not only threefold damages for any injury received by reason of a dispute or an attempt to reach an agreement, but also rendering the men and the organizations which I have just mentioned liable to imprisonment for one year, or a fine of $5,000, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Under the interpretation of the law by the Supreme Court in its decision, there is not anything that a labor organization can do or that the laborers can do in an associated effort, even if they be unorganized prior to the dispute, but which is unlawful. It is indeed true that under the decision our very organized existence is unlawful, rendering our men and our organizations, all of us, amenable to the law and to the penalties and punishments prescribed therein. Such a condition of affairs, of course, we regard not only as unfair and improper, but intolerable.

There are, I should say, roughly speaking, three million or more workmen in the United States who are organized in these unions, every one of them belonging to an organization which is an unlawful organization under that decision, and every member of the organization is acting in violation of the law; and there is not a thing of an ordinary character that these men or these organizations can do but what is in violation of the law under this decision of the court.

You can readily understand the position in which we are placed, and the question arises, Is it wise that such a condition should continue, and whether Congress ought not to remedy that?

How voluntary associations, not organized for profit or owning or issuing capital stock can be placed in the same category with those who deal in the products of others is beyond our ken. Is it wise, is it practicable, is it good for all our people, for the institutions of our country, that three millions of men who have associated themselves in organizations to advance their natural rights, the ownership of themselves, their power to labor, should be outlawed?

I may say this, Mr. Speaker, that the organizations of labor have in our country gone on practical lines, not violent, not on the lines that we find movements of labor have pursued in other countries, but on the contrary it has been the aim to conduct organizations and their efforts strictly within the law and with a desire to be within the law always. I think that in all the world there is not a condition parallel with ours at this moment, when there are so many unemployed workers; yet I doubt if there could be duplicated anywhere, with respect to what we are fortunate to have in the United States; that is, a feeling of security both for life and property, notwithstanding that awful condition of affairs. It has not come by mere accident. It is true that the influence of American institutions and of American ideas and ideals has contributed much; but from our observation we are justified in the statement that there is no element in all our country that has instilled such a feeling and sense of self-restraint as the organizations of labor into the working people of the country. Our efforts in this direction, in the direction to instill still further this sense into the minds of our fellow-workmen and operate upon their course of conduct, ought to have some consideration. Is that influence for good to be wholly ignored and our organizations to be wholly outlawed, our men outlawed, our organizations attempted to be dissolved in some form or other by the process of Government execution, or suits at law, instituted by anybody, and under the provisions of a law that never was intended to apply to voluntary associations of labor? It is not good for the present, and it must be exceedingly injurious, if not dangerous, to the future. If we can not conduct our movement as we have conducted it heretofore, so that in the future the men who have endeavored to devote their abilities, whatever they may be, to develop this spirit of self-restraint and respect—if these are outlawed, then there is no use, there is no place, for the men of the American labor movement where they can exercise any influence whatever for rationalism, for development, for progress upon lawful lines.

It is not a question of position in the labor movement, or salary in the offices of the labor movement, to which we refer, because I may say with every degree of confidence that there is not a man within my knowledge who is devoting his efforts to the labor movement who could not do infinitely better, so far as financial consideration is concerned, if he devoted half his ability and energy in any other direction. It is not that. But if the men who are now devoting their energies in the labor movement are by the law outlawed and can not exercise that influence for good among their fellows, discontent with existing wrongs, the defense against greed, the hope to aspire to something better, will not die, but it will find its expression somewhere else in some other form. What that form is or may be no one can foretell, but that it will be along the lines of rational development and progress I doubt very much.

It is a matter, really considered from that view point, of choice as to whether those in responsible positions, having opportunity to determine—whether the labor movement, as we understand it and as we have tried to conduct it, shall be lawful and proper and recognized for its social effect and for its support of republican institutions, as you and all of us understand them and as you have so very splendidly portrayed them, shall continue, or whether this discontent shall find its expression in another form, whatever that may be.

The feeling among our fellow-workmen all through the country is certainly more intense than we could attempt to describe in words. What they feel should be accomplished, and how it is to be done is diverse, and the true portrayal of it I can not give. But as I say, the feeling is very intense. The impatience for relief is exceedingly marked; and we have endeavored—in conference the representatives of fully two million organized workers and of a large number of farmers have met together and discussed this matter, as well as the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, meeting two days in advance—we have tried to express in the document, in as moderate and concise a form as possible, what we believe to be the best way out of the situation; and for that reason we have submitted some suggestions in order to meet and overcome the situation.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Gompers, I have read the case that you have referred to, the "hatters' case." I know nothing of that case except what appears of record. When a case is presented to a court and is decided, whatever is necessary to decide touching the matter at issue, upon the record as presented, makes a precedent. That case alone is decided, and it then becomes the law for all similar cases. I do not profess to be a great lawyer. On a country circuit thirty years ago I got my bread and butter, after I had grown up——

Mr. MAHON. A cornfield lawyer?

The SPEAKER. The cornfield preceded that.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. TILLMAN said he was that kind of a lawyer.

The SPEAKER. The cornfields abounded in Illinois, and still do.

Now, frankly, as I read that case, I do not find anything in it that makes unlawful the voluntary association of labor to better its condition, nor do I find anything in the decision involved in the record that would render unlawful the organization of a union and the unity of a contract. What may be held by the courts in the future, when a case is presented, I am sure I do not know; but I think I know one thing, that as to the right of voluntary organization—and I emphasize voluntary organization—of men who live in the sweat of their faces to better their condition, whether it be a society, a benevolent society, or whether it be a so-called "labor organization," it has the right to its organization, and will continue and ought to continue to have that right protected by law, subject only to one limitation—that in any legislation enacted it shall apply to all alike.

Do not misunderstand me. I have said many times that if by the exercise of my muscle, crossed on skill, I lived in the sweat of my face, I should belong to the organization which, under the changed conditions of production, you call a labor organization. So far as I am concerned, I do not believe that the courts will hold, even under existing law, what you fear. If there is anything in the law that prevents labor from organizing so as to enable it, through organization, to make contracts with employers, I am ready to go, hotfoot, to help change the law.

Confining myself to the record in the hatters' case, I find that the record showed, briefly, that there was a boycott prosecuted against an American citizen, or citizens, who were engaged in the production of hats. The record shows that they did not recognize the union; whereupon a boycott was organized all across the continent, which extended to their customers, and in turn to the customers of their customers, and so on. That is the record, and it was upon that record that that decision was made.

I believe the interests of union labor lie along the line of cooperation under the law; and there is not a nerve in my body that fails to protest and cry aloud against two things: The black list and the boycott. I am quite in harmony with the views of the commission in the anthracite coal strike. I do not believe union labor is to be harmed, but rather is to be strengthened by insisting that the black list shall not exist, and that the boycott shall not exist.

I say again, your memorial will be referred, and I believe it will receive honest and careful consideration by the House of Representatives. And if it does not, Brother Gompers, there is an appeal that is open to me, and you, and every other citizen; that is, to appeal to all the people, and they will condemn or approve at the ballot box, after full discussion. As one who believes in the policy that I have indicated I am willing to meet and discuss it. I may be wrong, but if so, and if the party that I cooperate with is wrong, we ought to fail, and the same with every other party.

Thank God, I am an optimist. I am not in sympathy in respect to one thing that you say, namely, that you can not speak as to what may happen. I think I can. I believe this Caucasian race of yours and mine is competent in the United States for self-government.

Mr. GOMPERS. Let me say just a word. In one of the Supreme Court decisions, under the Erdman Act, it was decided that employers may discharge workmen for any reason whatever.

The SPEAKER. Yes; and the workman may refuse to be employed for any reason whatever.

Mr. GOMPERS. The black list—that is, one employer sending to another employer information regarding an employee, with a request, perhaps, for his nonemployment or his discharge——

The SPEAKER. Yes; and where that would amount to concerted action amongst employers, that would constitute the black list, and I say, blast the black list!

Mr. GOMPERS. That is upheld by that decision.

The SPEAKER. I do not think that is involved in it at all. Suppose you are an employer and I come to you, Mr. Gompers, and I want to be employed by you. You say to me, "Do you belong to union labor, or are you outside of union labor?" I would say according to the fact. Suppose I would say, "I am outside of union labor," and you would say, "Then I will not employ you." Or suppose I should say, "I am inside of union labor," and you would say, "I will not employ you." That is your right. You could employ or not employ for any fantastic notion, as between you and me, that you chose to. But if you go out to other employers and procure or induce them not to employ me, so that I, weary of foot, may go and knock and knock for employment, and the answer comes, on account of such conspiracy, "I will not employ you"—that, I say, is the black list, and I would damn it.

Mr. GOMPERS. In according the employer the right to discharge an employee without reason, or for any reason, that implies unquestionably the right to discharge him because he is a member of a union, whether by an association of employers or by an individual.

The SPEAKER. Oh, nay, nay! A man may employ or not employ for any reason, or no reason. A man may receive or refuse employment for any possible reason. Take a man that belongs to union labor. You may lawfully refuse to employ him. Take a man that does not belong to union labor. You may lawfully refuse to employ him. But when you reach out, after you have exercised your right not to employ—you may have done it foolishly and selfishly and wickedly—when you reach out and enlist people that stretch across the continent and pursue the poor fellow and, by virtue of that pursuit which is, in effect, a conspiracy, he goes footsore and hungry without employment, that is a different thing. That is a black list and unlawful.

After all, if we could go out to the people, all of us, and could get the records and stand and fight it out on the merits, it would be well. But all of us never have done that, and never will, short of the millennium, do that, because in contests as to who shall be intrusted with power we fight fair or we seize hold of something that is unfair, we strike above the belt or we strike below the belt. However, it has improved in that respect since I was a boy. Politics is fairer to-day in discussion than it ever was before in sixty years.

Gentlemen, I am glad to have met you, and I want to say another thing right here, and I say it because I mean it: There are no eight men or no hundred men, if you have that many gathered together here, that have greater responsibilities than you have, and I want you to know that I realize that. I may not agree with you; we have not always agreed in the past, and when we do not agree, man to man, we fight it out. But I ask you to understand that I realize the responsibility that rests upon you gentlemen and upon those that you cooperate with, and I do not object in the slightest to your organization, because it tends, when it comes out in the sunlight, after full discussion, to the betterment of the race. So do not go away feeling that I have gotten a prejudice or that I would embarrass you.

THE FARMERS AND GRAIN DEALERS' ASSOCIATION OF ILLINOIS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Mason City, Ill., March 19, 1908.

Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You will find attached hereto copy of a resolution unanimously adopted at the annual meeting of the Farmers and Grain Dealers' Association of Illinois, held in Bloomington February 26 and 27. Over 1,500 delegates were present, representing 170 farmer grain companies in Illinois, with a membership of over 25,000 grain growers. The men who grow the grain and the really independent dealer are most emphatically unanimous in demanding Federal inspection. The big terminal elevator interests which control the board of trade in the large centers are the people who are at the bottom of the fight on Federal inspection, as they desire the same old system, by which the grain from the producers may be inspected into their elevators a grade or two lower than it really is and inspected out a grade or two higher than it really is.

The grain growers of Illinois respectfully request your support in behalf of the Federal inspection and grading of grain. Will you kindly let us hear from you?

Yours, truly, J. A. MCCREERY.

Resolved, That we favor the inauguration of a system of Federal grain inspection and grading of grain along the lines provided for in the McCumber bill, and we call upon the Senators and Representatives from the State of Illinois to bend every effort toward securing the enactment of such legislation by Congress at an early date.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (S. 3163) to create a tariff commission.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I wish at this time to detain the Senate for a very few minutes to answer the objections which have been suggested to the idea of having experts find out the facts upon which a tariff should be built, and to have those experts make classifications for a tariff statute. Later on I shall hope to go more at length into particular schedules.

Before I begin what I have to say, I will state that I have received a great many hundreds of resolutions from various commercial bodies throughout the country, and a larger number of letters from important manufacturers and producers of other kinds throughout the country. I shall not, of course, burden the RECORD with all of them (that would be asking too much), but I shall ask, without reading, that a few of the letters and a few of the resolutions shall be spread upon the RECORD as a fair sample of many hundreds of others.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

INDIANA REPUBLICAN EDITORIAL ASSOCIATION,
Seymour, Ind., March 19, 1908.

Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: At the midwinter meeting of the Indiana Republican Editorial Association held in Indianapolis January 17, 1908, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That we enthusiastically indorse the bill introduced by Senator BEVERIDGE providing for a commission of tariff experts, whose duty it shall be to study the tariff in all its varying phases and applications and report to the next Congress. We believe that in this way the true condition of the tariff situation will be disclosed and the needed revisions of the schedules suggested."

The above resolution not only expresses the judgment of the Republican newspaper men of Indiana, but the people of the State in general. The more they study this important question the more firmly are they convinced that your bill creating a commission of tariff experts should become a law.

Very truly,
EDWARD A. REMY,
Secretary Indiana Republican Editorial Association.

[Resolution of National Board of Trade, Washington, D. C., January 23, 1908.]

PERMANENT TARIFF COMMISSION.

Whereas the changed conditions, both at home and abroad, have indicated the necessity for a reclassification of many of the items in the present tariff list and the possible creation of new classification in certain directions;

Resolved, That it is the sense of the National Board of Trade that Congress should enact laws revising the tariff as expeditiously as possible; further be it

Resolved, That we indorse the general principles of Senate bill 3163 introduced by Senator BEVERIDGE creating a permanent tariff commission.

THE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
March 14, 1908.

Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This association is on record in favor of treating the subject of tariff revision as a business proposition and not as a means to an end for the temporary needs or advantages of any political party.

The association favors the establishment of a standing national expert commission to investigate such matters as may relate to the subject of tariff, to the end that the result of such investigations shall be made the basis for wise recommendations to Congress for suitable legislation in the interests of the country as a whole.

In view of the fact that the subject of tariff revision is now being discussed, we beg to ask that you kindly present this communication to the United States Senate, and oblige,

Yours, very truly,
JAMES T. HOILE, Secretary.

MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF YORK, PA.,
York, Pa., March 3, 1908.

Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a well-attended meeting of the above association, held March 2, 1908, the following resolution was unanimously passed:

"Resolved: That the Manufacturers' Association of York, Pa., enthusiastically indorses the proposed tariff commission as outlined in Senator Beveridge's bill, S. 3163. The association believes the time has come to correct the glaring inequalities which exist in our tariff laws, and that a capable, fair-minded commission, such as is proposed in Senator Beveridge's bill, is the best practical method of accomplishing tariff revision."

We submit the above to you for what it may be worth, and we earnestly trust that your proposed bill will become a law.

Yours, truly,

THE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF YORK, PA.,
R. E. GEPHART, Secretary.

KANSAS STATE GRANGE,
Olathe, Kans., March 19, 1908.

Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As the representative of the grange in Kansas I write you to express our approval of your bill to establish a tariff commission, and not only hope but will do what we can to make your effort successful.

The National Grange placed themselves on record at Hartford, Conn., last November in regard to this matter, and the Kansas State Grange at its session in Lawrence, Kans., last December expressed themselves strongly in favor of a revision of the tariff.

We want to assure you that we heartily indorse your bill and appreciate your effort.

Yours, truly,

GEO. BLACK.

"Resolved, That the board of directors of the Board of Trade of the city of Newark favor the enactment of Senate Bill No. 3163 introduced by Mr. Beveridge, providing for the appointment of a tariff commission, as a measure which will tend to improve the industrial interests of the country; further, that the Senators and Members of Congress from New Jersey be respectfully requested to advocate and vote for its enactment."

Respectfully yours,

Master Conn. State Grange.

OHIO STATE GRANGE,
Mantua, Ohio, March 20, 1908.

SENATOR BEVERIDGE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I note the introduction of your bill for the creating of a "non-partisan tariff commission." The national grange has given their unqualified indorsement and I sincerely hope you can pass the measure.

Respectfully,

F. A. DERTHICK, Master O. S. G.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE GRANGE,
Huntingdon, Pa., March 17, 1908.

Hon. A. J. BEVERIDGE,
U. S. Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have noted your efforts to secure the appointment of a nonpartisan tariff commission with decided approval. I trust they may be successful. The grange membership in Pennsylvania are in sympathy with this movement.

Very truly, yours,

W. F. HILL,
Master State Grange.

NORDYKE & MARMON COMPANY,
Indianapolis, Ind., March 16, 1908.

DEAR SIR: We have heretofore written to you expressing our indorsement of the tariff-commission bill, and wish to reiterate all that we have heretofore said in favor of this bill. We have for years been in favor of legislation of this kind, and our present attitude is not prompted by any person or organization. We sincerely trust that you will be successful in securing the passage of the tariff-commission bill.

Respectfully,

Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,

STATE GRANGE OF WISCONSIN,
Medina, Wis., March 20, 1908.

Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I understand that you have introduced into the United States Senate a very commendable measure, providing for the appointment of a nonpartisan tariff commission. This is a step taken in the right course, and to place this important feature outside of partisan policies is certainly placing it where it must be to measure equality.

In behalf of the membership of the Wisconsin granges I wish to say you have our support.

Very respectfully,

H. M. CULBERTSON,
Master Wisconsin State Grange.

NEW JERSEY STATE GRANGE,
Mullica Hill, N. J., March 21, 1908.

Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: It affords me pleasure to congratulate you on the stand you have taken with reference to a nonpartisan tariff commission, and as a representative of nearly 20,000 patrons of husbandry of the State of New Jersey, I sincerely trust that your colleagues will give you that support that your measure is entitled to, and at the same time heed the request of the more than 200,000 members of the grange represented at its recent annual session at Hartford, when without a dissenting voice a resolution was adopted calling for such a commission.

Very truly, yours,

G. W. F. GAUNT,
Master New Jersey State Grange.

VERMONT STATE GRANGE,
Brattleboro, Vt., March 17, 1908.

Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I heartily commend the action you have taken in introducing in the United States Senate a bill favoring the appointment of a nonpartisan tariff commission. I certainly hope this measure will become a law and that we shall be able to realize the same in the near future.

Again assuring you that I heartily indorse the measure, and that you can depend upon me to help you in any legitimate way in securing the passage of the same, I remain,

Very truly,

G. W. PIERCE,
Master of the Vermont State Grange.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, when I had the honor of addressing the Senate upon the tariff-commission bill, which I presented, I said at the beginning that I was not personally wedded to that bill or to any particular measure; that I was determined only upon the idea—the idea that seemed to me to be so full of common sense—and so demanded by the exigencies of the present situation.

Since that time two criticisms have been made, usually in conversation, and only once publicly, of the idea of having experts help Congress in finding out the facts and in making the classifications, and it is to reply to these two points that I have risen at this particular moment to address the Senate.

It is first said, Mr. President, that we ought not to have any measure, whether a tariff-commission bill or a joint resolution, directing the designation of experts to do this detailed work for Congress, because Congress should part with none of its legislative power. I believe that is the objection most frequently heard and in conversation most frequently discussed.

The criticism, Mr. President, shows that those who have made it, making it sincerely I doubt not, have nevertheless not read the bill or examined a single argument advanced in support of it. For the first thing to which attention was called was that this bill carefully refrains from taking from Congress, either directly or indirectly, any of its legislative power.

It neither authorizes nor permits the commission or other body of experts to make a recommendation concerning a single item of a single schedule.

It confines the body of experts solely to the work of investigating the facts and making the classifications. One of those, as has been pointed out already, is purely investigating work and the other is purely scientific clerical work. Neither one of them by any stretch of the imagination or any construction of language can be considered legislative work.

Fixing the duties is legislative work, and fixing the duties by experts is not contemplated by those who not only here, but much more throughout the whole country, are insisting upon this modern, this common sense, and this scientific method of preparing for tariff revision.

So the answer to the first objection which has been made is that it simply is not true. Neither is it in the bill which I had the honor to present, so far as the bill is concerned, nor is it in the language of anyone who has advocated the idea. I have pretty thoroughly read the now voluminous literature that has grown up, issued by various producing bodies throughout the country, such as the National Manufacturers' Association, the National Stock Breeders' Association, various associations of farmers, etc., and in none of this literature is it contemplated to deprive Congress of the minutest and most infinitesimal fraction of its legislative power.

So anyone who takes a stand against this proposition upon that ground must depart to some other ground.

Why anyone, Mr. President, with any view of any tariff theory should object to having experts do the clerical work of Congress, merely because Congress has not time to do that particular work, I have not been able to comprehend. Surely no one objects to having facts found out; surely no one objects to a scientific classification. And Congress can not do this work.

I had the honor to present to the Senate the exact facts, giving dates as to the time spent by the committees of the two Houses when they have heretofore framed a tariff bill; and I showed that the very limited time which they were compelled to occupy proved that they could not do this vast and this detailed work.

I quoted an article from the former Senator from Missouri [Mr. Vest] giving the experience of the subcommittee which had this work in charge when the Wilson bill was being framed,

Senator Vest testified that three Senators on the Finance Committee from sheer overwork and worry were stricken, and I believe that not one of them finally recovered, and each one of them owed his death to the hurried toil incident to the framing of that bill.

But, Mr. President, briefly as I intend to speak, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to an even more conclusive piece of evidence than this testimony of Senator Vest, and I hope that I shall have the attention of Senators while I read it, because if they take a stand upon this measure they will want to bear this in mind.

I hold in my hand the second volume of a work entitled "The Making of America," in which I find an article on "The Tariff and the Trusts," written by one of the ablest men of either party in either House of Congress, a man who perhaps has, with the exception of probably two men in the Senate, more familiarity with tariff making than any man in either House. I refer to the Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, and I wish to read a few extracts from this article. He says:

> But let us first consider the history of trusts in the United States.

Then I skip some details. Mr. PAYNE continues:

> Perhaps as good an example as we can find of the earlier form of a trust is in "The Sugar Refineries Company," which was formed in 1887. The facts in respect to this company have been pretty thoroughly investigated in an action brought by The People of the State of New York against The North River Sugar Refining Company, which was one of the original parties to the deed of trust. This case is reported in full in 121 New York Reports, page 582. There were seventeen sugar refining companies which entered into this combination. Some of these companies were copartnerships, others were incorporated.

Then follows a long and detailed account of the Sugar Trust, and Mr. PAYNE goes on:

> Here, then, was a trust, pure and absolute, formed by these seventeen companies. Each put its property, and endeavored to place its franchise, under the control of a board which was to hold the property as joint tenants and as trustees, but had the power of absolute control. It was a trust pure and simple.
> * * * * *
> The board of trustees, formed as we have seen—

And now we come to the making of the tariff upon this matter—> forgot to carry out the original intention of the deed of trust. They did endeavor "generally to promote the interests of the parties hereto" with a vengeance, but they evidently did not keep the price of sugar as low as was consistent with reasonable profit. Notwithstanding the enormous watering of stock, dividends unheard of before were declared and paid upon the certificates issued by this board of trustees. As the product of this combination was a necessary of life required by every class of people, the excessive profits demanded soon called the attention of the people to the existence of this monopoly. Nobody objected to refining sugar in this country.

Now, I come to the quotation from this article for which I would be very much obliged to have the particular attention of the Senators. This is Mr. PAYNE, who is testifying from his own experience:

> Indeed, there was every reason why this business should be carried on exclusively in the United States in order to supply our markets. The object in forming the sugar schedule of the tariff in 1890, and again in 1897, was to learn, as nearly as possible, the exact cost of refining sugar, and then to adjust the tariff as to protect the labor interests, and no more. INVESTIGATION INTO THIS SUBJECT PROVED VERY IRKSOME AND TROUBLESOME. IT WAS IMPOSSIBLE TO GET AT THE EXACT FACTS, AS THE EXPERTS WERE NOT INCLINED TO REVEAL THE SECRETS OF THEIR BUSINESS TO THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS. Different statements were made as to the cost of refining by different refineries, and then the best that could be done was a compromise rate for the differential duty between raw and refined sugar.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Indiana has quoted from something said by Mr. PAYNE. As the Senator from Indiana, I think, very justly says, Mr. PAYNE may be regarded as one of the greatest tariff experts in the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not say "experts." I said he is one of the ablest men in either House of Congress in either party, and that he has had probably as much to do with the framing of tariffs, and therefore I read this quotation from the article.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think Mr. PAYNE may be regarded as one of the greatest tariff experts in the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana whether Mr. PAYNE has not quite recently declared very emphatically that he is opposed to any commission such as the Senator from Indiana has advocated.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, I think he did; and I am trying to very clearly and conclusively answer the only objections that have ever been made, either in public or private, to this bill by Mr. PAYNE or anybody else.

The Senate has heard the first, which was that Congress should not part with any of its legislative power. I have shown that that criticism could have been made only by persons who have not even read the bill; for, in my bill at least, I very carefully guard against Congress parting with any of its legislative power. I provide that the commission, or body of experts—it is immaterial what you call it—is confined to exclusive business of investigation and classification, which I tried to show at a former time could not possibly be done, and as I shall show in a moment never has been done by a committee of Congress, at least so far as classifications are concerned.

Then I referred to the fact that it seemed incomprehensible to me that anyone who wanted the facts—whether a Senator, a Representative, or a committee of Congress itself—should object to having experts help them with that work any more than a Senator or Representative should object to having a secretary help him with his work.

To reenforce the testimony that I have heretofore presented as to the difficulties of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, or the Finance Committee of the Senate, in doing this very work, I added to that testimony the statement of Mr. PAYNE, made in this article, in which he says it was impossible to get at the facts because the sugar experts would not give the facts to the Ways and Means Committee. Of course if a body of experts is authorized by Congress to find out the facts, with power to administer oaths, and if necessary to produce books and papers, that extreme difficulty so clearly presented by Mr. PAYNE would disappear.

Now, Mr. President, hurrying on, for I do not want to occupy attention more than five minutes longer, to the second objection which has been made, which is that we had a former commission in 1882 and that its work was totally unavailing, all of us have heard it said, until it has been accepted as more or less true, that the work of this commission amounted to nothing; that Congress paid no attention to it. Indeed, it has often been stated that the report of the commission of 1882 was so long that nobody read it.

I have the report of that commission before me. Here it is. It consists of 45 pages of carefully reasoned matter; and it embraces in its recommendations, so far as the report itself is concerned, provision for a customs court, which has since been adopted, provision for the administrative tariff laws of the Treasury Department, which has since been adopted, and it may be accurately said that every substantive recommendation of that commission has since been followed by Congress.

But, Mr. President, that was not all. Unlike the commission which my bill contemplates, the commission of 1882, in addition to its 45-page report, also reported a tariff bill. This tariff bill, which I have before me, does two things. First, it makes a classification of schedules, and, second, it fixes duties upon several thousand items under those schedules.

First, then, as to the classifications. It is a fact of history to which no one apparently has paid any attention—not I more than anyone else, because we have not studied it—that the first and only scientific classification of the tariff schedules ever made in America was made by the tariff commission of 1882, and that classification adopted by Congress remains with a few changes to this day. The present classification is in substance the classification made by the commission of 1882, with some detailed additions and some detailed subtractions; but the classification itself as a scheme of a tariff is kept practically intact to this day.

So we find that every substantive recommendation of that commission was the foundation of nearly all of our tariff laws since, such as the customs court, such as the administrative laws of the tariff for the Treasury Department, and also that its classification was the first scientific classification ever made in this country.

Now, is it true that Congress waived aside this commission's recommendations in other respects? I have before me the bill which was the recommendation of the commission of 1882. Here it is on my desk. Here on this other desk is the law of 1883. I have compared the bill recommended by the commission and the bill passed by Congress. I find, first, that the classifications recommended by the commission were adopted as a scheme practically intact, and I find, second, THAT CONGRESS EVEN ADOPTED THE ENORMOUS MAJORITY OF THE DUTIES RECOMMENDED BY THE COMMISSION.

This is no mere assertion. It is merely a condensation into one sentence of what any Senator will find by comparing the bill reported by the commission of 1882 and the bill adopted by Congress in 1883.

So it would not appear to be an entirely accurate statement that the work of the commission of 1882 had no effect upon Congress, and was waived aside as being of no account; for Congress not only adopted the scheme of classification almost intact as recommended by the commission, but also actually adopted an enormous majority of the duties as recommended by the commission.

The law of 1883 is, with some exceptions, that at a later time in this session I shall point out, practically the bill reported by the commission. So the statement that has hitherto gone undisputed, until all of us had come to believe it, that the work of the commission of 1882 was of no value and did not receive the attention of Congress, is refuted by the statute itself when laid along with the report of the commission itself.

I find, Mr. President, to be specific, that classification Schedule A, chemicals; Schedule B, woods, etc.; Schedule F, tobacco; G, provisions; J, hemp, jute, flax; H, liquors; L, silk; M, books and papers; M, sundries, were adopted by the bill as passed by Congress from the report of the commission, without many changes. I find that the changes made were in Schedule C, metals; E, sugar; L, cotton, and K, wool.

The changes that were made in these rates I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate this morning in explaining, but I will refer to one or two as examples. It may be possible that I shall have occasion hereafter to go over nearly all the changes in detail in the duties recommended by the commission and the duties as fixed by the law itself based upon it, nearly all of which I say are identical with the report of the commission, but with some changes.

But at the present moment I shall refer to but two examples. I find that wood pulp, dried and ready for paper making, was placed by the commission of 1882 on the free list, and that wood pulp, dried ready for paper making, was one of the recommendations that was changed. It was put by the commission on the free list. The bill itself places upon this article 10 per cent ad valorem. And I have found it in the wrong classification. Of course, I know that placing it in the wrong classification was not intentional—I do not even intimate that it was—but it is found under "Books and papers," instead of under the proper classification.

Now, Mr. President, that is one. I call attention to another. I find that iron ore was placed by the commission at 50 cents a ton and was raised by Congress to 75 cents a ton. It is only these two items to which I wish to call attention this morning, but the thing to which I particularly wish to call attention is—and I repeat it for the third time—that not only is the scheme of classification made by the commission the one which was adopted by Congress in its entirety, but it has been preserved to this day with additions from time to time; and, second, that Congress actually adopted the rates of duty on the enormous majority of all the items as recommended by the commission of 1882.

Mr. President, this concludes about all that I have to say this morning, and I call this very brief attention to these two objections because they are the only two ones I have heard.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not one of those within the class suggested by the Senator from Indiana who have not read his bill. I have read it with a great deal of care.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not have any reference to the Senator, either.

Mr. HEYBURN. And I have listened to his remarks both on the former occasion and this morning.

I should like to inquire the purpose of appointing these commissioners for a period of seven years as provided for in line 12 on page 2. If the commission is to be of any assistance or use in tariff legislation in the near future it seems to me that there is no occasion for appointing it for seven years.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That may be true, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. The only report provided for in the bill is contained in lines 16 and 17 on page 3, which says that they shall do certain things and that they shall lay the result of their work before Congress at the earliest possible moment. The appointment of a commission for seven years arbitrarily, when there is no provision for the office terminating in less than seven years, seems to me like looking a good ways into the future in ascertaining facts to be used at a comparatively early day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think that the Senator's criticism is very intelligent, indeed, and it was not to any such criticism as that that I rose to speak this morning. It may be that that provision of the bill should be modified. I will say to the Senator my purpose in putting that in, as well as my purpose in drafting the entire bill, was to provide what you might call a permanent scientific commission; but my main purpose, as explained in my first speech and as I repeat this morning, was the idea of having facts and having classifications made by a body of experts who could assist the committees of Congress in doing this necessary preparatory work which Congress can not do.

The Senator will call to mind the first sentence of my remarks upon this bill, that I was not wedded to my own bill or to any particular measure, but that I was very emphatic upon the idea itself. Perhaps the Senator's suggestion may be, for practical and immediate purposes, very wise. I am not insistent upon the period of seven years. The point about it is the idea, the very simple idea of having help for Congress in finding facts and in doing its detailed work, and my purpose in addressing the Senate this morning was to answer the criticisms that have been made of the idea.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I realize that, and it was only because it seemed convenient this morning to obtain light as to certain provisions in the bill that I took an opportunity to make the inquiry.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am always very glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. There was another suggestion which occurred to me upon the occasion when the Senator from Indiana first presented this bill, and that was as to the language contained on page 3, beginning in line 20, where it is provided that—> or by the direction of Congress by resolution, said commission shall sit with said above-named committees of the House and of Senate during the said sessions of said committees when said committees are drafting or considering any bill affecting the customs tariff laws of the United States.

Now that is rather a mandatory provision, that they shall sit with the standing committees of Congress.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, I think he will, on rereading that, see that that was designed—and perhaps it is not necessary in the bill—only to put this commission at the service of the appropriate committee of either House whenever they wanted it. That was all; that is to say, this body of experts, whatever you call them, commission or anything else which does this work, would help the committee, so that they can be ready to go on without the stress and difficulty which we have shown has heretofore existed; that these experts shall not only lay the report of their work before the two committees, but if the committees feel that they need their further help the experts shall sit with the committees. Perhaps it is surplusage, however.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suppose that the intention of the Senator in drawing the bill was to place the service of the commission at the disposal of the committees?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, absolutely.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not at the pleasure of the commission, but at the pleasure of the committees?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Absolutely. I will say to the Senator that he has the idea that is in my mind precisely. My idea, I will say to the Senator from Idaho and to other Senators, is that these experts shall be a servant, a clerk, an aid to Congress. That is all. The Senator has the precise idea; and the purpose, as I have explained that language, was that if the committees want the commission to sit with them, they can have it sit, and nothing is to be at the pleasure of the commission—nothing. It is to be absolutely a servant of Congress, to do work which Congress finds, on account of the magnitude of its other labors, it can not do itself.

Mr. President, there is this one further thing to be said about the commission of 1882. Although I have shown that it made the first scientific classfication ever made in this country, which has been the foundation for every classification since then; although I have shown that this classification as a scheme was adopted substantially intact by Congress in the law of 1883; although I have shown that even the great majority of the duties that the commission recommended on thousands of items were adopted by Congress practically without change.

I have cited two changes that were made and the schedules in which large changes were made, and it may be necessary at some time further on in the session to call attention to that at great length. But although Congress accepted all of this work of the commission of 1882 it must be said that that commission was not a fair sample of what a commission could do if it had ample time. It must be remembered that that commission of 1882 had only five months, and that those five months were chiefly in the heat of the summer. The report, which any Senator can read, is only 45 pages long. It is at the head of this suggested bill, and it is signed by every member of the commission, only one of whom, Mr. Robert Porter, an able and accomplished economist, is now living. It is a most comprehensive and moderate statement of their difficulties and of the work they had accomplished.

Of course, the ideal commission should have at least one year, and, preferably, a year and a half to do the work. A body of experts created now—and, I repeat, it is immaterial by what name you call them—to do the work of preparing for tariff revision by the Congress which will be elected this fall, would have practically an entire year; that is to say, they would have seven months more time than the former commission had. Notwithstanding the limited time in which that commission was compelled to do its work, its work was nevertheless, in spite of those obstacles, so excellent that Congress adopted it almost entirely, and the laws since added to our general tariff scheme, such as the customs court and the administrative laws, will be found to be those suggested in the report of that commission, which was their basis.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate any longer; but I rose at this time to occupy only these five or ten minutes to say that the first criticism which has been made to the bill, namely, that Congress should not part with any of its legislative power, does not apply to the idea now advanced, and, secondly, that the work of the commission which existed in 1882, limited as it was as to time and great as were the difficulties that surrounded it, nevertheless was not laid aside by Congress, but the great body of it, both as to classification and even as to recommendation of duties, was adopted in both branches and enacted into law. Why should anyone who has expert work to do and can not do it himself object to having experts help him? Why should he object to help, even if he had time to do the work itself? What is the bottom reason for resistance to finding out the facts?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, line 11, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "twenty-four" and to insert "thirty," so as to read:

The name of Joseph R. Thomas, late of Company B, First Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEWITT EASTMAN.

Mr. BULKELEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4749) for the relief of Dewitt Eastman.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will not object to the consideration of this bill, but when it has been considered I shall insist upon the regular order.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 6, after the word "Artillery," to insert: "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the name of Dewitt Eastman, late of Company B, Second Minnesota Volunteers, and of the Fourth United States Artillery: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. MILLER.

Mr. BULKELEY. I also ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6006) to correct the military record of John M. Miller.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of War to review the military record of John M. Miller, late of Battery K, Fifth United States Artillery, and to grant to him an honorable discharge from the service as of date December 14, 1865; but no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINING TECHNOLOGY BRANCH IN THE GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I now insist upon the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded, which is the Calendar under Rule VIII. The Secretary will state the first business on the Calendar.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 35) to provide for a mining technology branch in the Geological Survey.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has left a memorandum at the desk, to the effect that he wishes to be present when the joint resolution is considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the joint resolution go over, then, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go over without prejudice.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 4132) creating an additional land district in the State of South Dakota was announced as next in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A memorandum has been left at the desk by the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] to the effect that he desires to be present when this bill comes up. He is not now in the Chamber.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, the bill has been pending on the Calendar since the 5th of February, when it was reported from the Committee on Public Lands. I am very anxious that it should be disposed of. I understand a memorandum has been made by my colleague that he wants to be present when the bill is taken up. He was in the Chamber just a few minutes ago. I ask that the bill be laid aside temporarily. I do not want the bill to lose its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid aside for a moment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am informed that the Senator from North Dakota would like to be present when that bill is considered, as he has some amendment he desires to offer to it.

Mr. KITTREDGE entered the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from South Dakota is now present. The Secretary will again state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4132) creating an additional land district in the State of South Dakota.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I take it, Mr. President, that that bill is not to be pressed this morning, in the light of negotiations which are pending.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, as I have before stated, great pressure has been made for the passage and consideration of this bill. It affects a large number of people in the northwestern part of the State of South Dakota. They are far removed from a land office, being 300 miles, practically, from the land office on the east and from 150 to 200 miles from the land office on the south. Petitions have come to me, reports have been made, and arguments submitted strongly urging the passage of this bill. I do not know whether there was any understanding, but some suggestion was made by my colleague this morning, and I spoke to the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] regarding the matter and suggested to him that this bill be taken up and considered.

I understand some amendments have been suggested by Representatives in the House from North Dakota. I was in conference with the Commissioner of the General Land Office a day or two since in regard to the bill, which is strongly urged by the Department, and there has already been very great delay. It seems to me, with a unanimous report coming from the Committee on Public Lands, with the proposition sustained by the Department, and strongly insisted upon by the people in that region, that some action should be taken on this bill. During the last fiscal year 350,000 acres were filed upon in this particular land district. In the county of Butte alone there are upward of 3,000,000 acres in this new land district. If it is suggested that there should be an amendment to cover counties in the State of North Dakota, let that come from the Representatives of that State. None of them have conferred with me in regard to it. I strongly insist upon the consideration of the bill this morning.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, I am not prepared to say this morning that I shall oppose the passage of the bill. The boundaries of this land district are not satisfactory to all the people who reside within its limits. There are also suggestions of amendments to the bill bringing some parts of North Dakota within the limits of this land district.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KITTREDGE. I do not want to put it in that way, Mr. President. I trust that my colleague will not, under the circumstances, insist upon its consideration. No later than 11 o'clock this morning——

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the junior Senator from South Dakota yield to the senior Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KITTREDGE. I have the floor, I think, in my own right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Not later than 11 o'clock this morning my colleague and I had a conference concerning the boundaries of this land district, and, as I understand, it was arranged that we should consult with the delegation from North Dakota concerning their wishes touching the incorporation of certain counties within the provisions of this new land district, if one is to be created. In the light of those circumstances, I am surprised that this bill should this morning be urged for passage. I do not like to be placed in the attitude of opposing the creation of a land office in my own State.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, as I have heretofore said, this bill was introduced on the 20th of January last. The movement for the creation of the land district was initiated prior to that time by the Interior Department, and, after conference with the Department, I subsequently introduced the bill. The lines of the land district are agreed to and recommended by the Department. It is true that there was an informal conference between my colleague and myself this morning, and it was suggested that a conference be had with the North Dakota delegation. In pursuance of that suggestion I spoke to the junior Senator from North Dakota, and it was suggested that this bill had better be passed here, and if there are to be modifications or changes let them be made in the House of Representatives. No member of the North Dakota delegation has made application to me regarding the matter, nor has any suggestion come to me from a single member of the North Dakota delegation. As I said, this bill has been pending upon the Calendar for upward of six weeks. If they are interested in any modification or change, it seems to me some suggestion should come from them, and the only suggestion that I heard in connection with it was the fact in my conference with the Commissioner of the General Land Office that an inquiry had been made of him—and that is all—as to whether in the administration of the office lands in two States could be embraced in one land district. I was informed by the Commissioner that such had never been the case, but that at the same time he did not see any reason why it could not be properly administered. This bill has lain here so long and has been so delayed that it seems to me if there are any reasonable objections to its consideration they ought to have been made known prior to this time. If the North Dakota delegation—and I speak with the utmost consideration concerning them—were anxious for or had any interest in the modification of the lines of this land district, they would have made it known before this time. In addition to that, I will make the suggestion that I conferred with the representative in the Senate, the junior Senator, and he suggested that the bill be passed, and that any modification could be had in the House.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, with my understanding of the situation I do not think this bill ought to be pressed at the present time. If my colleague insists upon my taking the position, I must object to its consideration this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will lie over without prejudice.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The bill (S. 48) to reimburse depositors of the late Freedman's Savings and Trust Company was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Let the bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar, at the request of the Senator from Mississippi.

WILLIAM CRAMP & SONS SHIPBUILDING COMPANY.

The bill (S. 3126) to carry into effect the judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of the contractors for building the U. S. battle ship Indiana was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the William Cramp & Sons' Ship and Engine Building Company $135,560, the amount found due the company by judgment of the Court of Claims for the preservation, care, maintenance, and insurance of the battle ship Indiana during the two years' delay in its construction caused by the failure of the Navy Department to furnish the armor as it covenanted to do in the contract.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPUTY CLERK AT BIG STONE GAP, VA.

The bill (H. R. 14282) to authorize the appointment of a deputy clerk at Big Stone Gap, Va., was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] asked to be present when the bill was considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be passed over without prejudice.

WHITE RIVER UTES, ETC.

The bill (S. 5038) for the relief of the White River Utes, the Southern Utes, the Uncompahgre Utes, the Tabeguache, Muache, Capote, Weeminuche, Yampa, Grand River, and Unita bands of Ute Indians, known also as the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians of Colorado was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A similar request was made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with respect to this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, let it go over.

Mr. TELLER subsequently said: What became of Order of Business No. 294?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was passed over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. I did so for the reason that the Chair stated that a request had been filed by an absent Senator that he wished to be present when the bill was considered. I have no interest in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] filed such a notice.

Mr. TELLER. There has grown up here a custom that a Senator may intervene, to which we must always submit, but I deny the right of any Senator to lodge with the Chair an objection to a bill to be considered. It never has been the rule and it never ought to be the rule. Of course if the Senator from New Hampshire objects, I can not inquire why he objects.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not object, and if the Senator from Colorado wishes the bill now considered, I will withdraw my objection. I did it simply for the reason that I understood the senior Senator from Massachusets had made the request, and I knew that we had fallen into that habit. I think myself it is not a very good habit.

Mr. TELLER. I will not insist upon the consideration of the bill at this time, but I shall insist that that is an irregular method of attacking a bill, and I am not willing to consent to it in the future.

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdraw my request that the bill go over.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Massachusetts had asked me to withhold action on the bill until he could be present, I should certainly have done so. It is a bill touching matters in my own State, and nobody else has any interest in it, and the Senator from Massachusetts has not any knowledge of it. But I do not desire to have it taken up in his absence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Under the circumstances, I will ask that the bill may keep its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over, if that is the desire of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over, at the request of the Senator from Colorado, retaining its place on the Calendar.

CHILD LABOR IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 4812) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. The senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] desires to be present when the bill is considered, and I ask that it go over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire.

REIMBURSEMENT OF CERTAIN INSURANCE COMPANIES.

The bill (S. 1368) to reimburse certain fire insurance companies the amounts paid by them for property destroyed by fire in suppressing the bubonic plague in the Territory of Hawaii in the years 1899 and 1900 was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAY. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report.

Mr. CLAY. I should be glad to have it read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. CLAPP February 26, 1908, which is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred Senate bill 1368, have examined the same and report it favorably with certain amendments, and as amended recommend its passage.

On page 1, line 3, strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "two," and strike out the word "five" and insert the word "two."

In line 4 strike out the word "eighty-five" and insert the word "twenty-five," and strike out the words "and thirty-eight cents."

In line 7 strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "nine," and strike out the word "one" and insert the word 'five," and strike out the words "and ten dollars."

In line 10 strike out the words "four hundred and."

In line 11 strike out the word "fifty" and the words "and fourteen cents."

In line 12 strike out the words "nine hundred and sixty-six" and insert the words "four hundred and fifty."

On page 2, line 1, strike out the words "dollars and eighty-six cents."

In line 2 strike out the word "eight" and insert the word "five;" strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one," and strike out the words "and seventy-two."

In line 5, at the end of the line, strike out the word "six."

In line 6 strike out the words "hundred and forty-five" and the words "and fifty cents," and insert before the word "dollars" the words "and twenty-five."

In support of the foregoing recommendation your committee beg leave to submit the following:

In the years 1899 and 1900, in order to prevent the spread of the bubonic plague in Honolulu, Hawaii, the American authorities at Honolulu destroyed by fire a large portion of the infested district, destroying many buildings and other properties. The losses now sought to be paid for were within the district burned at that time. Your committee refers to Senate report 1933, dated January 16, 1902,

Fifty-seventh Congress, first session. No appropriation has heretofore been made to cover the losses mentioned in the pending bill. The property owners, whose property was destroyed, not knowing what action would be taken by the United States, instituted proceedings against the insurance companies, and compelled the insurance companies to pay the fire losses.

In the former consideration of this subject, no part of the claims now presented were considered, nor was any appropriation made to cover the same.

The total amount provided for in this bill is $82,225, of which $13,400 is for American companies, $13,800 for German companies, and $38,025 for English companies.

The English and German Governments have, through their respective ambassadors, made representations to this Government respecting the payment of the claims of the companies of their respective Governments, and the honorable Secretary of State having investigated the situation has recommended legislation to that end. (See letter attached.)

After the fire, which was ordered by the Government, the Congress of the United States promptly recognized the liability of the Government for all losses sustained by reason thereof, and, with the exception of those paid by the insurance companies, paid the same.

When the insurance companies paid these losses, the companies became subrogated to all of the rights of the original property owners, and as such, are entitled to be reimbursed for the amounts paid by them.

Your committee has had before it and has carefully examined all of the proofs and find that the amounts stated in the bill have been paid by the respective companies, exclusive of interest and costs of litigation.

The present case presents this condition of affairs:

A plague existed—the authorities believed that it ought to be stamped out, and could only be done by the burning of the property. After the fire the companies made the defense that, as the Government had destroyed the property, the companies should not be held to pay the losses. The courts held otherwise, and the companies were compelled to pay. They became subrogated to all of the rights of the property owners, and it is now plainly the duty of the United States to pay back to the companies the amounts so paid by them.

The following is a list of the companies, together with the number of such policies, the amounts thereof, and the amount paid on each policy, exclusive of interests and costs:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 4, 1906.

SIR: It has been brought to the attention of the Department that in 1889 and 1900 the American authorities at Honolulu, in order to check the spread of the bubonic plague then epidemic in that city, destroyed many buildings in the infected district by fire; that a commission was appointed under an act of the legislature of Hawaii to hear and adjudicate all claims for property destroyed by order of the authorities in the suppression of the plague, which has rendered judgments aggregating a little more than $1,500,000, and that by act of Congress of January 26, 1903, an appropriation of $1,000,000 was made to pay such judgments and an issue of bonds of Hawaii authorized to liquidate the balance of the claims.

Much of the property so destroyed had been insured, but most of the policies contained a protecting clause, known as the New York standard form, exempting the insurers from liability for any loss for property destroyed by the act of the civil authorities. In all of this class of cases the Department understands that awards were made by the commission to cover such losses.

It has been represented to the Department that in other cases, particularly in the case of some foreign insurance companies, there was no protecting clause in the policy, and in these cases the holders recovered the face of their policy from the companies. It would appear that in some of these cases the beneficiaries executed "Articles of subrogation," assigning their claim to the extent of the face of the policy to the insurers. In others the entire claim appears to have been so assigned.

The fire-claims commission, it is represented, has failed to make awards to the companies on their subrogated rights, and a bill has been introduced in Congress (S. 3900) to reimburse these companies to the extent of their losses. The ambassadors of Great Britain and Germany have made representations to the Department on the subject and have informed it that they would gladly welcome the passage of the bill as an act of equity.

While the Department has not investigated the claims individually for the purpose of ascertaining the amounts of the losses suffered by the companies in question, it would be glad to indorse any legislation having for its object the reimbursement of these companies for the actual losses which they sustained as an immediate consequence of the fire.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
ELIHU ROOT.

Hon. JOSEPH B. FORAKER,
Chairman Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, United States Senate.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. CLAY. It strikes me that that covers the case. I understand the Government had the property destroyed, the insurance companies paid the losses, and now the Government is to repay them.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, which were, in line 3, after the words "sum of," to strike out "eighty-seven thousand five hundred and eighty-five dollars and thirty-eight cents" and insert "eighty-two thousand two hundred and twenty-five dollars;" in line 10, after the word "company," to strike out "ten thousand one hundred and ten" and insert "nine thousand five hundred;" on page 2, line 1, after the word "thousand," to strike out "four hundred and fifty dollars and fourteen cents" and insert "dollars;" in line 3, after the word "thousand," to strike out

"nine hundred and sixty-six dollars and eighty-six cents" and insert "four hundred and fifty dollars;" in line 5, after the word "Company," to strike out "twenty-eight thousand two hundred and seventy-two dollars and twenty-one cents" and insert "twenty-five thousand one hundred dollars;" and in line 10, after the word "thousand," to strike out "six hundred and forty-five dollars and fifty cents" and insert "and twenty-five dollars," so as to make the bill read:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 28, 1908.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the committee's letter dated February 26, 1908, inclosing a copy of S. 5594, "For the establishment of a light-house and fog signal at the easterly end of Michigan Island, Apostle Group, westerly end of Lake Superior, Wisconsin," and asking that the committee be furnished with such suggestions as may be deemed proper touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage, this Department has the honor to state, at the instance of the Light-House Board, to which the matter was referred, that the words "or near" should be inserted in the first line of the title of the bill to agree with the tenth line of the body thereof, and with this amendment made recommends that the bill be passed.

Several vessels have gone ashore in this locality during storms in the past three or four years, so that a light and fog-signal station here is greatly desired by the maritime interests on the Lakes.

Very truly, yours,

OSCAR S. STRAUS,
Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
United States Senate.

LAKE CARRIERS' ASSOCIATION,
Detroit, Mich., February 29, 1908.

Hon. WM. ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Relative to bill introduced by you in the Senate for the building of a light-house on or near the easterly end of Michigan Island, I desire to call your attention to some of the reasons existing why this light-house should be built.

There is at present a light-house on the westerly end of Michigan Island, but this has no value to boats navigating to Ashland on the course from Keweenaw Point, as the light can not be seen until steamers are abreast of it, and the Ashland traffic is the principal commerce on that portion of the lake.

Michigan Island light was originally established as an aid to boats navigating from Portage entry and Ontonagon through the islands to Bayfield, which commerce has very largely decreased; in fact is now only nominal, while a very large commerce to Ashland has come into existence and is constantly increasing. The result is that a great necessity exists for a light and fog signal at this point, as it is on the direct course for vessels from Keweenaw Point to Ashland.

A great many ships go light to Ashland for ore and also a great many take cargoes of coal to Duluth and Superior and come from there to Ashland to load ore, and this aid to navigation would be of the greatest assistance to them as well as to ships coming up the lake direct to Ashland.

Of the many casualties which have occurred at that point, I desire to call your attention to two alone. In the heavy gale of November, 1905, the steel steamer W. E. Corey stranded at this point, costing about a quarter of a million dollars to release and repair her. In the fall of 1906 the steel steamer R. W. Ireland stranded in the same place, costing $200,000 to release and repair her. The damage to these two boats alone was over $450,000. In addition to this there have been quite a number of minor casualties.

The Lake Superior commerce of the Great Lakes now comprises about 80 per cent of the whole, and is constantly increasing, so that the importance and value of this light and fog signal is very great.

At a meeting of our masters held in Cleveland expressly for the purpose of going over lights and aids needed for navigation they unanimously agreed that a great necessity existed for this light.

A bill was introduced in the Senate last session by Senator Spooner for the building of this light-house. The bill passed in the Senate, but failed in the House.

The building of this light-house is recommended by Maj. Charles Keller, light-house engineer of this (the eleventh) district, and also approved and recommended by the Light-house Board.

I sincerely trust that you will use your best efforts to have this bill passed.

I am reasonably sure that Senator FRYE is somewhat familiar with this bill, and should you want any further information on the subject I will be pleased to send it to you.

Truly, yours, W. LIVINGSTONE, President.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEASE OF SAN CLEMENTE ISLAND, CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 4856) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to lease San Clemente Island, California, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 2, after the word "use," to insert "except as hereinafter specified;" in line

3, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" in line 6, after the word "than," to insert "approximately;" in line 12, after the word "buildings," to insert "stone quarries, piers, landings," and in line 25, after the word "farming," to insert "and that all ranches and buildings shall be kept in good sanitary condition," so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized, directed, and empowered to lease and demise to the San Clemente Wool Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of California, its successors and assigns, for the purpose, however, of farming, the unused light-house reservation in California known as "San Clemente Island" for and during the full period of twenty-five years, for its and their sole and exclusive use, except as hereinafter specified, at an annual rental, payable in advance, of $1,500, and an expenditure by said company, or its successors or assigns, of $25,000 (not less than approximately $1,000 in any one year of said term) in improving the said island and protecting it from devastation by accretions of sand: Provided, That in said lease it shall be stipulated that the Government of the United States may at any time during the term thereof go upon said island and construct thereon at any point light-house buildings, stone quarries, piers, landings, or other governmental structures, and take possession of such portion or portions of said island as may be required for such purposes. It shall be further stipulated in said lease that the said expenditure of $25,000 in improving said island shall be expended in developing water, constructing dams and reservoirs for the storage of water, erecting windmills, water tanks, building fences, houses, buildings, and wagon roads, reseeding the island to trees and grasses, and planting spineless cactus for the purpose of stopping the drifting of the sands and of creating additional pasturage, and such other general improvements as may be necessary for the conduct of the business of sheep and general farming, and that all ranches and buildings shall be kept in good sanitary condition. Said lease shall confer upon the said company the authority to construct on said island such reservoirs, dams, windmills, water tanks, fences, houses, barns, buildings, ditches, flumes, canals, roads, telegraph and telephone lines, trails, wharves, piers, and landings as may be necessary or proper for the uses and purposes herein set forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 25, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" on page 4, line 20, after the word "lease," to insert "in natural term or by cancellation of the same;" and in line 22, at the end of the section, to insert "It shall also be stipulated that no part of the said island of San Clemente shall be sublet to other parties," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may at any time during the said period of twenty-five years, at his discretion, terminate and cancel said lease, in case said company shall fail to pay the said rental of $1,500 per annum in advance or shall fail and neglect to expend the sum of $25,000 in the improvement of said island, as herein specified; and, in order that the Secretary may be advised regarding the expenditures made by said company, it shall be further stipulated in said lease that said company shall annually, on the 1st day of January, file with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor a statement, under oath of its president, showing in detail the expenditures made by said company during the previous year and the character and extent of the improvements made on said island by said company, which statement shall be accompanied by good and sufficient vouchers. It shall be further stipulated in said lease that Government officials shall have the right to go upon said island at any time, and shall have the right to inspect the improvements made by said company under the terms of said lease. It shall also be stipulated in said lease that all improvements made upon said island by said company, and all buildings and other structures erected thereon by said company under the terms of said lease shall upon the termination of said lease, in natural term or by cancellation of the same, be and become the property of the Government of the United States. It shall also be stipulated that no part of the said island of San Clemente shall be sublet to other parties.

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3023.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed, without detaining the Senate to read at length, a protest against the Aldrich bill by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, and a like protest from the Wilmington Board of Trade, of Wilmington, Del.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Protest against Aldrich bill to amend the national banking laws by the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

At a very fully attended meeting of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, held March 6, 1908, and specially called for the consideration of currency legislation, the report of the committee on banking, recommending the following action, was accepted, and the resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the Boston Chamber of Commerce is opposed to the passage of Senate bill 3023 for the amendment of the national banking laws, known as the "Aldrich bill," because

"1. It is makeshift legislation, which tends to perpetuate another piece of makeshift legislation originally adopted as a war measure, and which had chiefly for its object the creation of an artificial demand for Government bonds rather than a scientific elastic currency.

"2. It provides for the subtraction of $500,000,000 of mercantile balances from active trade.

"3. It contemplates the investment of $500,000,000 of deposits payable on demand in long-time obligations instead of in short time and constantly maturing obligations, which constitute the proper and customary method of employing bank deposits."

The acute strain on our national banks of the recent panic is now over, the country is not under the stress of war, and the Boston Chamber of Commerce believes that now is the proper time to set the house in order by a comprehensive, constructive, and scientific piece of currency legislation, and we have confidence that the intelligence and patriotism of Congress can give us a currency system which will equal in merit the best system in vogue in any other country.

The contemplated legislation should embody the following features:

1. An elastic currency which shall expand and contract not merely under the crux of a great commercial crisis, but shall be sensitive to the seasonable and other minor fluctuations of trade.
2. The currency should be guaranteed by the Government.
3. The Government should be amply protected in its guaranty by such tax as shall serve to fully cover any possible loss under the guaranty.
4. The emergency currency should not be marked or labeled in any way as emergency currency, but should consist of a fluctuation in amount of the currency normally in use.
5. If the currency is to be secured by the special pledge of collateral, the banks should be permitted to deposit with the Government clearing-house certificates secured in turn by the deposit with the local clearing house of short-time mercantile paper.

A true copy of the action taken by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, March 6, 1908.

DANIEL D. MORSS, Secretary.

MARCH 19, 1908.

Whereas the Trade League of Philadelphia, the Merchants' Association of New York, and other commercial bodies of the country have adopted resolutions strongly opposing the so-called "Aldrich currency bill" now pending in Congress, because it would injure business interests in the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Board of Trade of Wilmington, Del., hereby join in protesting against said bill, and respectfully asks the representatives of this State in Senate and House to vote against said measure.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be sent by this board to each of Delaware's Senators and its Representative in Congress.

CRITICS ANSWERED—TRUST CONTROL ANALYZED.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in the beginning of my remarks I directed attention to the industrial reorganization the country has witnessed within the last ten years. It was made clear that our industrial and commercial life has passed into the hands of a few men. I produced in evidence the names of certain men and the directorships they hold, showing community of interest and centralized control of all the great national industries. I stated that control was lodged in less than one hundred of those named. That was a very conservative statement, Mr. President, but it has been assailed by a section of the press, as a sensational invention, to create prejudice for political advantage.

Mr. President, there was no occasion for the organs and claquers of the System to become frenzied over my statement, so easily proven by the directorates of trusts and combinations controlled by the System.

I am able to cite to-day an authority they will not dispute. The significance of reorganization and consolidation was so manifest that economic and financial writers have discussed it for years. Permit me to quote one that even Wall street must accept.

Mr. Sereno S. Pratt, editor of the Wall Street Journal, and the author, sir, of a most excellent economic study of Wall street, as a great financial and market center, published in the World's Work, a little more than two years ago, an article entitled "Our Financial Oligarchy." Among other things he said:

Already in this country one-fifth of the estimated wealth is represented by the capitalization of the trusts. As one-third of the capital stock held in block is sufficient to control a company, if the rest of the stock is widely distributed, so the highly concentrated trust power may be said to control the business of America.

Notwithstanding the fact that stock may be widely distributed, the method of control by a very limited number is thus stated by Mr. Pratt:

In practical operation, however, the stock company is subject to autocratic or oligarchical control. The stockholders do not vote—they send proxies that are held by the powers that be. Many of the directors are mere dummies or fillers-in, or salaried officials, or representatives of dominant interests that may not always appear openly. The power is commonly exercised either by one man or by an executive committee, composed of those who by ownership or monopoly are able to control. It is not difficult for a small group of financiers to dominate properties worth billions of dollars, belonging to thousands of investors, who have really no voice in their management. This power of control may occasionally be lost; the stockholders may revolt or rival capitalists buy in, but in general it can be perpetuated. There has thus been developed what may be termed the divine right of high finance to rule.

Mr. Pratt then submits a list of seventy-six men and denominates them "our business rulers." He states that these seventy-six men were, at that time, holding, in round numbers, sixteen hundred directorships in the trusts and combinations of the country. Of this list he states, and I quote further:

Possibly there are several names on this roll that a more discriminating judgment would reject; probably there are ten or fifteen more names that should be included. At least fifty of the names can not be questioned; and of the list as a whole it may be said that it is fairly representative of the corporation power of the United States.

He says further:

Mr. John Moody estimates that the trust power of the United States is $20,379,000,000. These men control that power and more. They are also the dominant influence in the banks and trust companies having deposits of $10,000,000,000 and a capital investment of $2,750,000,000. An analysis of their power will show that fully 100 of the greatest railroad, industrial, and banking corporations, with a capitalization equal to more than one-fifth of the nation's wealth, are controlled by them.

Here are the more important of the interests which they either control or in which they are very influential:

Interests controlled.—Banking, iron and steel, coal, gas, electric light, shipping, oil, beef, insurance, copper, cotton, hardware, real estate, dry goods, agricultural implements, railroads, telegraph, cable, telephone, traction, express, mining, sugar, tobacco, coffee, wool, machinery, building paper, and food products.

As illustrating the centralization of railroad control, the author cites eight men, who control two-thirds of the railway mileage of the country, and nine billion of the thirteen billion of railroad capitalization as it then stood. The men named as masters of transportation were: J. Pierpont Morgan, A. J. Cassatt, James J. Hill, E. H. Harriman, George J. Gould, W. K. Vanderbilt, W. H. Moore, and William Rockefeller. Of these eight men he says further:

They control the coal trade also, and their influence extends over the express companies and through many industrial corporations. As masters of the railroads they have a taxing power—if prices charged for transportation can be so termed—equal to the taxing power of Congress, and the gross income of the railroads is nearly two thousand million a year, as compared with the Federal Government revenue of about seven hundred million.

The author discusses further the control of banking, insurance, and industrial organizations of the country, by various small groups within the list. Running through these groups, however, is seen the "tie that binds," through individual ownership, and through those who serve as agents or attorneys for others, representing allied interests.

While the editor of the Wall Street Journal expressed the belief that there were "signs" of revolt, division, and declining power in this oligarchy, yet events which have since transpired, such, for instance, as Harriman's still further combining great railroad systems and the United States Steel absorbing Tennessee Coal and Iron, indicate the ruling tendency for still greater centralization and control in the hands of a yet more limited number of men.

That such consolidation has gone forward more rapidly since the publication of Mr. Pratt's article is abundantly proven, as I shall presently show.

In the list which I have prepared, and shall incorporate in the printed record of my remarks, there will be found practically all of the names selected by Mr. Pratt, with additions thereto, resulting from such investigation as I have been able to prosecute. It was my purpose to err upon the side of making the list too large, rather than too small, as representing the control of the business interests of the country. I did this well understanding that critics would point out the names of those having the least power and influence as typical of the entire list.

But any fair presentation of the subject requires that there should be embraced within such list not only the men powerful through individual ownership, but those who serve as agents or attorneys for others representing allied interests.

Some of the men whose names appear on this list seem sensitive about it, as though they were personally assailed. Some of them have even grown violent in denunciation and denial.

It was no surprise that Mr. Forgan, of the First National Bank of Chicago, and Mr. Dawes, of the Central Trust Company of Chicago, should both protest and deny. They declare that they do not share in any such control of the business of the country. In a way they state the fact. They do not control, in the sense that they are even an infinitesimal part of the real, dominant power. They are at the head of two System institutions. They are "mere bank presidents," as they would be designated by the head of the System. Their position is well understood anywhere in Wall street. They take their orders from higher up. Even a glance at their directorates shows the System connections.

Upon the directorate of Mr. Dawes's trust company you will find a Standard Oil railroad, the beef trust, and other special interests represented. Among the directors of Mr. Forgan's bank you will find men who serve in the same capacity upon the directorates of Standard Oil and Morgan railroads, transit companies, trust companies, insurance companies, industrial trusts, and System banks. G. F. Baker, a portion of whose testimony during the Armstrong investigation I have placed before you, president of the First National Bank of New York, the principal national bank in the Morgan group, is found upon the board of directors of Mr. Forgan's Chicago bank.

Dawes and Forgan are a part of the business control of the country, as the ward boss is an essential part of the machine control of a city. Their positions are of no more importance than those of some others in the list who serve as mere "dummies" or "fillers-in" in various places for the System. They were all named as necessary to show the general plan of government which these financial masters have set up over us. It would have served a useful purpose to have still further enlarged the list from this class, as it would have aided to a better understanding of the real interests of some apparently disinterested capitalists.

On the other hand, Mr. President, it would have much reduced the list had I named only those who constitute the real governing power. I repeat, sir, I was very conservative in making the list and the statement with which I presented it to the Senate.

In naming the men who controlled the trust power of this country in 1905, Mr. Pratt cited Mr. John Moody as to the magnitude of this power. John Moody is the author of publications which are consulted every hour of the day in Wall street as a guide to investors in railroad, industrial, and other securities. I doubt, Mr. President, if there can be found in the United States a man equally well informed upon the subjects concerning which he writes. Mr. Moody's work, from which Mr. Pratt quoted, gave the statistics as of January 1, 1904. Since that time an enormous increase in trust consolidation has taken place.

TRUST GROWTH, 1904 TO 1908.

Mr. President, Mr. Pratt thought he saw symptoms or "signs," as he expressed it, of possible division among these great organized groups that were in control. All signs fail, Mr. President. Statistics prove that centralization has never made greater progress in the history of this country than it has made since the article was printed by Mr. Pratt.

Mr. Moody has just prepared a revision of these statistics, bringing the figures down to January 1, 1908. I have been fortunate in obtaining the proof sheets of this revision, and present in the following table the figures for 1904 and 1908, in parallel columns:

Table showing growth of trusts, 1904–1908.

[Statistics by John Moody.]

Classification of trusts.	January 1, 1904.		January 1, 1908.
	Number of plants acquired or controlled.	Total capitalization, stocks and bonds outstanding.	Number of plants acquired or controlled.	Total capitalization, stocks and bonds outstanding.
Seven greater industrial trusts	1,528	$2,662,752,100	1,638	$2,708,438,754
Lesser industrial trusts	3,426	4,055,039,433	5,038	8,243,175,000
Important industrial trusts in reorganization	282	528,551,000	----------	----------
Total important industrial trusts	5,288	7,246,342,533	6,676	10,951,613,754

All trusts	8,664	20,379,162,511	10,020	31,672,160,754

This table shows an increase in trust consolidation and capitalization almost beyond human comprehension. It shows that in these four years the trust capitalization was increased by these few men in control of the big business of the country more than $11,000,000,000, or more than 55 per cent. This $31,000,000,000 of industrial, franchise, and transportation trust capitalization in 1908 does not represent all the corporate power in the hands of the Standard Oil-Morgan combination. It does not include their financial consolidations—their banks, trust companies, and insurance companies.

Mark you, sir, four years ago the consolidation of industrial, franchise, and steam railroad corporations aggregated, in round numbers, $20,000,000,000. To-day, in four short years, just those three lines of consolidation aggregate over $31,000,000,000.

Men may treat with indifference this tendency. To me, sir, and I believe to the awakened interest of the great American public, it is becoming the one question, the one issue. System ownership and control of business is of course approved by all who profit by it directly or indirectly, but to the independent American citizen who is thinking of the welfare of his country it assumes a grave and portentous aspect.

CLASSIFICATION OF THOSE IN CONTROL.

Along with this enormous increase in trust power has gone a steady process of centralization in the control of that power, until now the entire situation is dominated by the Standard Oil-Morgan combination. Mr. Pratt named seventy-six men. I named nearly one hundred, because I wished to include in my list enough men to show the method and connections of the System. When you begin the process of elimination to reach the real source, the true fountain head of control over the business life of the people of this country, you come down, sir, to two names:

STANDARD OIL AND MORGAN.

All feuds between these two great powers have been put aside. Mr. Morgan's picture hangs on the wall of the inner room of the Rockefellers, at 26 Broadway. This union was inevitable unless stayed by the strong arm of Government. In combination to-day they are steadily absorbing the smaller powers. Some gentlemen in this country may feel content with the present situation. Wait a little, Mr. President, the hour will strike for them. Mr. Hill has been taught that he must not oppose the big ones. The Gould interests are being swallowed up by the combine. Morse and Heinze were neatly pocketed during the recent panic. The smelter trust was given a drubbing and started in the same direction. The Vanderbilts can not long retain their important control, and themselves see the handwriting on the wall.

In the list of men who may still be said to be in control of the country's business, there are only fourteen who can treat with the Standard Oil-Morgan combine on anything, even remotely approaching a footing. These men may be roughly classified and described in groups. We have the men of large means and considerable independent control who, a few years ago, might have been, in combination, a potential menace to either Standard Oil or Morgan, but to-day they find their only success lies in maintaining harmony with the big ones. These men are:

W. K. Vanderbilt.	E. H. Harriman.
George J. Gould.	James J. Hill.
John Jacob Astor.	Henry C. Frick.
August Belmont.	Thomas F. Ryan.
Jacob Schiff.	W. H. Moore.
James Speyer.	J. Ogden Armour.
Frederick Weyerhauser.	Louis F. Swift.

In the foregoing group are found big operators and men of large power and interest in their own right. Here are also found the big independent bankers, Jacob Schiff, James Speyer, and August Belmont. The two latter have a special element of strength in the support of foreign money. They all find that existence depends upon maintaining the most cordial relations with the Standard Oil-Morgan combine. These fourteen men are, next to Standard Oil and Morgan, the great powers in the control of our industrial and commercial life.

The balance of the list may be divided roughly into two classes. The first class comprises men of large wealth and real power, nearly every one of whom would fit into the group I have just given, except that they are stars of lesser magnitude. Some are "mere bank presidents" who, for the most part, take orders; others are attorneys and representatives of the combine of the same rank. These men are:

C. H. Dodge.	C. Ledyard Blair.
J. H. Post.	J. F. Dryden.
P. A. Valentine.	J. B. Duke.
Cyrus H. McCormick.	D. Guggenheim.
M. Taylor Pyne.	V. P. Snyder.
William D. Sloan.	John Claflin.
Stephen S. Palmer.	Charles Lanier.
T. H. Hubbard.	A. N. Brady.
Adrian Iselin, jr.	James C. Fargo.
Brayton Ives.	Edwin Hawley.
G. G. Haven.	John R. Hegeman.
Frederick Cromwell.	D. O. Mills.
C. A. Peabody.	C. H. Mackay.
W. J. Oakman.	Daniel G. Reid.
G. W. Young.	Charles Steele.
G. F. Baker.	F. W. Vanderbilt.
E. J. Berwind.	Henry Walters.
John J. Waterbury.	Thomas Dolan.
J. J. Mitchell.	P. A. B. Widener.
Norman B. Ream.	E. H. Gary.
Oliver Ames.	Samuel Rea.
T. Jefferson Coolidge.	W. A. Clark.
H. L. Higginson.	Dumont Clarke.
Nathanial Thayer.	E. B. Morris.

The balance of the list, embracing thirty-five names, are the handy men of the System. They have little or no power except that which is delegated. In so far as they have any power at all they exercise it in a representative capacity. This group contains the attorneys, the bank presidents of lesser order, the dummy directors, the fillers-in, the figureheads. These men are:

Edwin S. Marston.	Levi P. Morton.
Moses Taylor.	J. H. Parker.
Henry A. C. Taylor.	H. C. Demming.
G. W. Perkins.	H. H. Vreeland.
Francis M. Bacon.	Frederick Sturgis.
C. S. Fairchild.	Charles H. Russell.
John W. Sterling.	Woodbury Langdon.
Samuel Sloan.	Chauncey M. Depew.
Otto H. Kahn.	A. E. Orr.
Luther Kountze.	Oliver H. Payne.
A. D. Juilliard.	Charles M. Schwab.
James N. Jarvie.	H. McK. Twombly.
H. P. Whitney.	W. S. Webb.
C. H. Allen.	James H. Parker.
A. W. Kretch.	E. F. C. Young.
P. D. Cravath.	Charles Dawes.
V. Morawetz.	James B. Forgan.
Paul Morton.

Mr. President, any man with ordinary intelligence, who sees the same names repeated over and over again on the various directorates which, in a national sense, dominate the great industries of this country, will understand how the important business interests are in fact welded and fused together into one mass under one control.

Sir, I have named certain individuals from time to time in the course of my argument upon the pending bill. If I am understood as making war upon these men, I disavow it here and now, I do not direct my attack against a Rockefeller, a Morgan, a Harriman. They are but types. They but embody an evil. Back of these men is the THING which we must destroy if we would preserve our free institutions. Men are as nothing; the System which we have built up by privileges, which we have allowed to take possession of Government and control legislation, is the real object of my unceasing warfare.

Mr. President, the statement that the business of the country in a national sense is controlled by less than 100 men—by less than 50 men—aye, by a mere handful of men, requires the citation of no authority further than the list of directors of transportation, industrial, and financial trusts, combinations, and corporations of the country. The official records of those institutions are in themselves the proof.

The business of the country is transacted by corporations and combinations of corporations. The control of corporations rests of necessity with a board of directors, the executive committee, and the officers of the organization. It is therefore only necessary to take the great controlling transportation and business organizations of the country, analyze the directorates, and the truth is ascertained. When the most significant names in the Standard Oil-Morgan groups are distributed with their all-powerful influence on the boards of directors controlling in a broad way transportation, industrial institutions, mining, iron and steel, coal, gas, electric light, shipping, copper, and other natural products and the industrial life resting upon them, together with the great insurance companies, and an overbalancing control of the banking institutions of the country, no amount of denunciation and personal abuse, from whatever source it may come, can by any possibility obscure the facts. So long as the official records of these controlling bodies stand as published to-day, the proof stands, and the case is made.

I apprehend, Mr. President, that in the near future in the various volumes entitled "The Directory of Directors" for the great industrial and commercial centers of the country, after the publicity which these names and their manifest connection and control have evoked, more "dummies" will be found [laughter], and that it will be a work requiring more industry and research to root out the control of the men whose names appear and what they represent. But it can be done. It will be done.

Mr. President, in the course of my discussion of this momentous question I have produced official records to prove that the massing and centralization of this great money power in the hands of these few men, coupled with the operation of the national banking laws, has resulted in gathering into a few great group banks in New York City practically all the surplus money of the entire country. I have produced record evidence to prove that commercial banking is being swallowed up in financial and speculative banking. I tried to suggest something of the enormous danger threatening our business integrity resulting from this change. I traced briefly the story of the recent panic; showed that legitimate industry was prosperous; that commercial reasons for a panic were wanting; but that there were other reasons sufficient for its promoters—speculative, political, and legislative reasons. To accomplish these several purposes the panic was carefully planned and skillfully staged. It was eminently successful. It removed obstacles in the highways of finance, settled old scores, made money for its managers, rebuked the "square-deal" Administration, disposed of the "third-term" menace, weakened support for political policies inimical to fictitous capitalization, and prepared the way for emergency currency legislation. Accordingly, we have this bill before the Senate.

WOULD STRENGTHEN WALL STREET POWER.

Mr. President, will not this bill invest the few masters of Wall street finance with still greater power? Will it not give them five hundred million more dollars of emergency money with which to play their Wall street game?

With the vast capital at their command they can still further extend their centralized banking power already established in the chief business centers of the country.

No one in the debate has undertaken to demonstrate that there is well-grounded business need for a $500,000,000 emergency currency. It has been assumed that the need of money to move the crops is the high function of this $500,000,000. It is convenient to seize upon some subject of human interest to promote or to defeat legislation that can not stand by itself.

Speak of railroad-rate legislation, and the railroads at once threaten a reduction in wages to elicit sympathy for the employees, whose wages, it is claimed, "must be reduced"—who may, indeed, "be thrown entirely out of employment." Nothing is said of reducing dividends on watered stock.

So the panic, originating primarily in reckless promotion and speculation, is attributed to lack of money to transport wheat and corn and cotton.

There was a time when the West looked to the East for money to move the crops.

But the West was not begging to borrow Eastern money last October. It was asking for its own money. It was praying to get back the savings of Western farmers, the product of Western industry, which, under the reserve system, had been drawn into New York and tied up in Wall street.

Not more than $200,000,000 is needed to move the crop. When some basis is required upon which to predicate any legitimate need for this elastic addition to the currency, we are always referred to the moving of the crops. Why, sir, it lies in the mouth of no man of fair intelligence here or elsewhere in this country to contend for a larger per capita circulation than we have already for ordinary business transactions. But there comes a time each year, a brief period, when a temporary demand is created for additional money for the moving of the crops. But this demand does not exceed in amount $200,000,000. No authority of standing has made a higher estimate.

The country banks of the Southern, Western, and Middle States—the principal crop-producing States—demanding such money, at or about the same time had on deposit elsewhere with reserve agents August 22, 1907, $124,630,240. The reserve cities in these same States had on deposit elsewhere in central reserve cities $150,607,745. Allowing for duplication, and allowing that some of this amount was on deposit in central reserve banks of Chicago and St. Louis, I believe these figures will warrant the assumption that fully half of the $410,000,000 which New York national banks owed the country last fall belonged to the crop-producing States of the South and West. If this money had been retained in the Western and Southern banks and not forwarded to Wall street, it would have moved the crops. This fallacious excuse would not now be offered for a $500,000,000 "emergency currency."

Let it not be said, sir, that this money that the country banks had on deposit in New York was lawful reserve money and that it could not have been used to move the crops had the banks in the crop-producing States retained it in their own vaults. I contend, sir, that the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury could be exercised to allow these banks to impair their reserves in time of need, if they had been retained at home, with as high justification as he could permit New York banks to allow their reserves to fall below the statutory limitation. If the banks of the crop-producing States were required to keep the money they send to New York, it would move the crops without taking anything from the amount of money which they are now required by the reserve system to keep on hand.

BILL DOES NOT MEET CONDITIONS.

All that can be urged for the relief that might be expected from this legislation must be predicated upon the claim that it will impart elasticity to our currency system. This it is argued will be secured by taxing the circulation. But, Mr. President, will there be any tax under this bill? That depends upon the machinery provided for its enforcement. The bill provides that the banks shall make monthly return of the amount of their notes in circulation, and the tax is to be determined accordingly. No penalty is provided for failure to report correctly. This opens the way to evade the tax on this circulation and leaves these bankers free to inflate and contract the currency at will.

Mr. President, this is precisely the manner in which we assessed railroads in Wisconsin. The officers of the roads were required to report under oath their gross earnings in the State each year. When we examined their books we discovered that for years they had systematically falsified their sworn reports, and defrauded the State out of millions of dollars. When the State brought suit to recover these taxes, the roads went into the circuit court and stipulated that they had so falsified their reports and went to the supreme court on the legal question whether the acceptance of the reports by the State officials did not bind the State and bar the recovery.

Mr. President, I believe the evidence I have quoted in this discussion from the Armstrong committee and other sources will show that the men in charge of the great financial banks are of no higher moral character and of no higher business ideals than the railroad managers who falsified their reports of gross earnings to escape taxation in Wisconsin.

But, sir, why did not the Committee on Finance in reporting out a measure take up this question of the reserves, around which so much of this debate has centered, in which, according to all the judgment and opinion of the leading financial writers of this country, lies so much of the weakness of our present system, and deal with that as one of the leading features of the bill?

It had a little place in the bill originally; it was stricken out; and we are told that some time, somewhere, later on, we may get something on this subject of reserves. We are about to vote upon this bill. We should know what its provisions are. I say, sir, the matter of reserves, together with some other subjects to which I shall call attention, should have had early and thorough consideration in any bill framed in the public interest pretending to avert the recurrence of conditions that gave rise to the panic of 1907.

As first proposed the bill contained no provisions which pretended to secure a distribution of the proposed currency issue equitably throughout the country.

The criticism of that defect of the measure compelled an amendment which on its face might seem to insure an equitable distribution of the increased circulation which the bill contemplates. I say that on its face this bill looks as if it might provide an equitable distribution of the $500,000,000, but every piece of legislation must be considered in contemplation of existing conditions. What are the existing conditions? What is the power of a limited number of men to-day with respect to such additional currency as this bill provides for? The Standard Oil group and the Morgan group have their connections through their investments in banks wherever it serves their interests throughout the Union. You need but take the bankers' directory of the country and study it to be convinced of this. You will be able to spot banks all over the country into which the control of those two groups extends. The Riggs Bank here in this city is one of them. I have called attention to two Chicago institutions. You can follow it over the country and trace it to a certainty, with sufficient investigation.

Morgan and Standard Oil have the financial power to extend that connection practically without limit. They have their own trust companies associated with their banks wherever located. They already hold the very securities for which this bill provides. They have the ability to acquire a practical monopoly of such securities. Their resources and profits from the control of all the great banking, transportation, and industrial institutions of the country not only put it within their power but make it worth their while to invest in such securities, where banks of small capital can under no circumstances afford to carry them. The control over the emergency currency that the possession of the specified securities, especially in time of panic, when call-money rates in Wall street run to 100 per cent, would make it well worth while for the big banks to acquire directly and indirectly a substantial monopoly of these securities. The smaller banks engaged only in commercial banking could under no circumstances compete with them or afford to acquire them.

Need I remind the Senate of the statements of former Secretary Gage, of former Secretary Shaw, of the many Western and Middle Western and Southern bankers who have sent their protests here that such banks do not hold and can not acquire these securities? Need I remind the Senate again that the chairman of the Finance Committee only one short year ago declared that municipal bonds, the very securities designated in this bill as a basis for this emergency currency, were so widely fluctuating that no prudent banker could afford to invest in them? He stated particularly that small banks could not afford to make such investments. He argued that such securities were held only by the big banks of New York and of other principal money centers.

IS AN AID TO FURTHER CENTRALIZATION.

Now, going a step further, sir, to see the effect, I do not say the purpose of this legislation, but the effect of it, you have these two groups. You can not brush aside the overwhelming testimony of their existence. The slightest investigation on the part of Senators will convince them, will overcome all doubt. This centralization has gone on and on. I cited the warnings of some of the leading economists of the country five years ago of the dangers of it. Now you have it. Its ramifications extend into every State in this Union. At a given word their banks, acting together for any section or for the entire country, can be first in line, offering their securities for this so-called emergency circulation, and through the power of their nation-wide organization they can impress upon the Secretary—any Secretary of the Treasury, whatever his politics may be—the necessity for such an issue. It is an awful situation in which to place a Secretary of the Treasury. They can pour their telegrams upon him. They can send upon every train men of ability and influence, an army of them, to plead with the Treasury that the hour has come, that a panic threatens, that an issue of emergency currency is needed to ward off disaster. If need be, they can create, whenever it suits their interests, the very conditions which, upon the theory of this bill, would call for an issue of emergency currency.

Nay, more than that, so vast are their resources, so complete their domination of the markets whenever trouble comes, that the assurance which this bill gives of panic money issued to order will serve to make the ordinary commercial business of the country more completely the prey of this mighty power. Talk about the equitable distribution which this bill provides for——

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do for a brief question. I am anxious to conclude my remarks to-day, if possible.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to ask the Senator whether in his suggestion that the banks of the country could not get these municipal and State securities as the basis of circulation he has considered the fact that already, under laws that have been in force for many years, the savings banks of New England have purchased these securities in large quantities and hold them as legal investments?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I have considered that, Mr. President; and let me say to my friend the Senator from Michigan that a thorough study of this subject will convince him that these great interests are not limited in their organization to national banks. They take in by purchase of stock or exchange of securities banks of whatever kind and trust companies wherever located.

The holdings of these securities by the State, private, and savings banks and trust companies under their control would be at the command of their national banks for securing circulation. Only national banks could take out circulation. Independent national banks engaged in commercial banking could not compete with the System banks over the country for control of these securities, even those held by other independent concerns.

The thought which I wish every Senator to keep in mind throughout the consideration of this question is that there is a mighty power to be dealt with here which will be the special beneficiary of this legislation, and that is a standing menace to the business of this country, a menace to legislation everywhere, and to the industrial and commercial independence of the people.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. SMITH. I have been under the impression that the placing of this class of securities in an emergency measure might tend to localize their purchase. If the securities now enumerated in the bill are issued by municipalities, it has seemed to me that the local banks and local investors would purchase them because of their added value and convertibility, and that the tendency of this legislation now would be to reduce the rate of interest that the municipalities now pay, because of the additional value given to their securities for this purpose, and that it would operate to decentralize rather than to centralize their market.

I should like very much to hear the Senator from Wisconsin upon that phase of this question, because it goes directly to the merits of the question itself.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me suggest to the Senator from Michigan that it does not lie with a little bank in Allegan, Mich., or anywhere else, to enter into competition with this System in bidding for municipal bonds, local or otherwise. What power, compared with the power of these group organizations, have the independent banks to gather in by purchase or otherwise the control of these securities?

Just look, Mr. President! On the 14th day of February, 1908, the report of the condition of the National City Bank of New York showed among its liabilities fourteen millions of borrowed bonds. It lies in the power of those great institutions, with their connections, to control the placing of these bonds. It seems to me that is too patent for argument.

Mr. SMITH. On that particular point, if the Senator will indulge me, I have had the impression and have given it some thought and study, that latterly Western banks and Western communities are investing in their own bonds; that it has become the custom of cities of the size of the one in which I live and of other cities in the West to buy their own securities at home. I think the same custom prevails in many Western States, and that the Eastern market is not left alone to bid, without opposition or competition, for these securities. A very recent issue of securities in my own home city illustrates that point. Our citizens and bankers bought them at what seemed to be the most favorable rate for that investment.

If I am wrong in that, if this bill will not tend to decentralize rather than to centralize these securities and their market, it puts an entirely different phase upon the situation than has heretofore been my view.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very glad to have the Senator say so, for he must surely see that this bill, if passed, will place a premium on these securities, that it will give them an added value when it invests them with the control of a currency issue. He must also see that this added value will be realized only by banks which can with profit use the securities to take out this emergency currency. This value will be far greater to those interests which can use this currency to make the enormous profits only known to Wall street in times of tight money. Legitimate commercial banking could earn no such profits. Does the Senator suppose that the little banks of Wisconsin or of Michigan or any other State can ever compete for the control of these securities with this mighty centralized money power? No; not for a moment, and I am sure the Senator must see that.

WILL PROMOTE MORE PANICS.

Mr. President, whatever the purposes of this bill, is it not manifest that it must inevitably aggravate the very conditions that now afflict commercial banking, whose office it is to promote all of the business transactions in this vast country between the producer and the consumer?

Sir, I would wrong no man. I would not unjustly decry Wall street or ignore the necessity of a great central market to provide capital for the large business undertakings of this country. I recognize the rights of capital and the service which capital can render to a great producing nation such as ours. But this Government guarantees equality of opportunity for all men, and it likewise guarantees equality of opportunity for all capital. Corporations and combinations of corporations, with their centralized banking and extending branch connections from State to State, are not entitled to special favors in legislation. This is not a bill for country banks, under which they can have equality of opportunity with city banks. It is the universal testimony, without, so far as my observation and correspondence extend, one dissenting voice from country bankers, that this bill is not for country bankers. It is not a bill even for the city banks engaged in commercial banking. It is a bill distinctively and specially for financial banks and trust companies speculating in securities.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. GORE. I ask the Senator if this bill might not hold out a temptation or a reward or a premium of $500,000,000 to those who can control the securities, for with a panic they can get the money and without a panic they can not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I have aimed to make it clear by my whole argument that the great and immediate danger back of this bill is that it offers a premium to the Interests that can make profit out of a panic. It would furnish them, sir, it seems to me, with every incentive to promote the conditions which would bring on panics, when you consider how wide their control is and how large a proportion of this so-called "emergency currency" they could command. They could take out this circulation through their System-controlled banks in the various States, and once it is in their control it can be sent to Wall street, where panic money brings a hundred per cent on stock-market loans.

PLAIN DUTY OF GOVERNMENT.

What is the duty of government in this legislation? The Government control of banks invites confidence because it increases business. The fact that a bank is a national bank carries with it the sanction of national protection.

Betrayal of the public by a Government-controlled bank is the Government betraying its own.

If the Government name is used in connection with a bank, its control should be sufficient, at least, to provide for decently honest bank management.

Mr. President, in the light of the panic, what legislation was demanded to meet the emergency? Legislation providing an abundance of quick money on which to run other panics or legislation taking banks, over which the Government had supervision, out of speculation; legislation which would contribute to private interests or legislation which would contribute to public interests?

To assume that nothing can be done, confesses a desire to do nothing.

Mr. President, I have not at any time discussed this subject professing an expert knowledge of banking and currency, but from the standpoint of experience in securing laws in the public interest, opposed by Special Interests.

I do not know how many Senators, on looking over their papers a day or two ago, saw an interview with the Deputy Comptroller of the Currency. It is an awful thing to put into the RECORD. Deputy Comptroller of the Currency Kane, in an interview in the Washington Post of March 21, says:

While numerous have been the recommendations of the eleven Comptrollers who have presided over the affairs of the Currency Bureau since its establishment, which, in the judgment of each, would have increased the security of the depositors and creditors of the banks, practically none has been enacted into law or has received the serious consideration of the legislative branch of the Government. No one has had better opportunities to observe from an impartial and disinterested standpoint the practical operation of the banking laws and to note their weak features in regard to the security of creditors than the respective Comptrollers of the Currency. Notwithstanding this indisputable fact and the many recommendations made by the several Comptrollers, there has been practically no amendment of the law since the passage of the original bank act of February 25, 1863, which can be said to have had for its object the particular welfare of the depositor.

Of the fifty-four acts amendatory of the original enactment which have been adopted since that date, practically all have been in the interest of greater latitude or privileges to the banks.

* * * * * * *

The remedies suggested for the many unsatisfactory conditions for which the national banking laws are primarily responsible may be found in the recommendations made from time to time by the Comptrollers of the Currency in the forty-five annual reports submitted to Congress since the establishment of the Currency Bureau, and until supplied by legislative enactment the responsibility should rest where it properly belongs—upon the law and the lawmakers, and not upon administrative officials."

Oh, what an arraignment!

IGNORES NEED OF NEW RESERVE REQUIREMENTS.

The details of legislation are always possible when the basic principle is once determined. If it is once settled that Government-controlled banks are to be controlled in the public interest, the details can then be wrought out.

The Aldrich bill does not show any such intent.

Figures from the official record show how the massing and centralization of the money power, coupled with the operation of the national banking law, has resulted in gathering into a few group banks in New York City practically all the surplus money of the entire country, for use there in promotion and stock-market manipulations.

It clearly appears that these great group banks, as approved reserve agents for other national banks, gather the money reserves of the country in ever-increasing millions. The official figures of the Treasury Department show that the national banks of New York City owed the banks of the rest of the country during the panic a net balance of more than $410,000,000. Of this the country banks were unable to withdraw more than 5 per cent in their time of direst need. The payment of even this meager 5 per cent was made possible, or morally forced, by the deposit of Government money with the New York banks. While the official records are imperfect evidence of the growth of financial and speculative banking in recent years, they do show its trend and extent. They show, as I have before said, that the ratio of bank investment in stocks and bonds to individual deposits increased from 8.9 per cent in 1890 to 28.2 per cent in 1907 and that the aggregate of such investment is now more than $3,690,000,000.

Yet this bill does not provide that sufficient reserves in lawful money—not watered stocks and bonds—shall be kept where they will subserve the interests of legitimate business and the depositors to whom they belong. There is no provision to prevent the money of the country being absorbed by the System and managed by the bank groups to carry on great speculating and promotion schemes.

NO PROVISIONS TO RESTRICT FINANCIAL BANKING.

The official records of the Armstrong report and the Interstate Commerce Commission proved beyond all question that men at the great national-bank center and in control of banking and the money system were engaged in operations in violation of their trust obligations and in contempt of public interest and statutory law.

I want to lay before the Senate a simple comparison between the manner in which bank funds and deposited money are invested by one of the leading financial banks of New York and by a large bank of London, England.

Mr. E. Clarence Jones, a New York banker, who is opposed to financial banking, before the joint committee on banks of the New York legislature February 18, 1908, made this comparative statement of the ratio of investment in stocks and bonds of the First National Bank of New York (December 3, 1907) and the London City and Midland Bank (Limited) (December 31, 1907):

Name of bank.	Deposits.	Investments in stocks and bonds other than Government bonds.	Per cent.
First National Bank of New York	$94,773,274.97	$55,221,761.77	58.26
London City and Midland Bank (Limited)	266,410,306.00	17,293,593.00	6.49

Permit me to quote briefly from this banker's argument in analysis of these figures:

The importance of the above figures with reference to the First National Bank of New York may be presented in another form. The deposits in the First National Bank on December 3, 1907, amounted to $94,773,247.97. The reserve of 25 per cent required by the national-bank act was $23,693,318.74. Deducting this reserve of $23,693,318.74 leaves a balance of deposits available for lending amounting to $71,079,956.23. Of this amount $55,221,761.77 was invested in stocks and bonds other than United States bonds. The result is that the First National Bank on December 3, 1907, had only $15,858,194.46 in addition to its capital and surplus which it could possibly loan to its customers. If this were generally done, would not banking become largely speculation, where the depositors could not win and might lose? Doubtless other institutions are conducted, perhaps not in the same proportions, but on the same lines. Banks and trust companies should not be allowed to invest in stocks and bonds, but should keep their money for loans to their customers. * * *

All loans to officers and directors should be prohibited.

This comparison brings out in a most striking way the proportions to which financial banking in this country has attained. Here we have the First National Bank of New York, one of the great banks of the Morgan group, with nearly 60 per cent of its depositors' money invested in stocks and bonds more or less speculative.

How much more of the bank's and depositors' money was tied up in collateral loans on this same kind of security I do not know. I can only draw certain inferences from the fact that when I asked for this particular information as to this and a few other of the leading New York banks I was informed that the Comptroller's office felt bound to guard these facts in secrecy, lest their publication "raise havoc with the banks."

NEED OF PUBLICITY IGNORED.

But this bill has no provision requiring publicity as to the affairs of national banks; as to their loans and investments that will safeguard in some measure the interest of stockholders and depositors; as to what banks are engaged in legitimate commercial banking and what banks are engaged in financial banking; as to what banks not themselves engaged in financial banking are forwarding the money of their depositors to other banks which are engaged in financial banking, in stockjobbing, and speculation.

There is nothing in this bill prohibiting bank officers and bank directors from engaging in underwriting and promotion syndicates; nothing to prevent their investing the funds of the banks which they manage and their deposits in the stocks and bonds of other corporations which they are promoting, or have promoted, or in which they are interested.

And yet, Mr. President, one of the bank failures in this very panic time cried to heaven for such legislation. Receivers found millions of its deposits invested in worthless promotion ventures in which the head and management of the bank was engaged. One would have supposed, if this were real emergency legislation, that it would have had something written in it providing for emergencies of that character.

There is nothing in this bill prohibiting officers and directors of national banks from borrowing the funds of the institutions which they control, the funds of their depositors, on securities which would not be accepted by an independent bank in which they would not have like authority and influence as in their own.

Whether Senators agree with me or not, that the panic of 1907 was deliberately planned for speculative, political, and legislative reasons, candid men reviewing the situation must conclude that unusual circumstances and strange conditions accompanied it. The country was materially prosperous. There were no commercial reasons for a panic. It was charged on high authority that there were political reasons. There is overwhelming proof of speculative reasons.

The situation at least calls for inquiry, for official investigation, to obtain facts upon which to prepare a measure commensurate with the evils shown to exist.

I submit that at least one new here, might have expected that a committee charged with preparing legislation on the heels of such a panic as that, would have made an investigation before reporting a bill.

No steps were taken for an investigation until a resolution was offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and that very recently.

NEEDED PENAL AMENDMENTS NOT PROVIDED.

The Aldrich bill does not provide the manifestly needed amendments to the penal statutes for the punishment of wrongdoing of officers of national banks—punishment which, added to the assurance of an occasional impartial investigation by a Federal grand jury of their conduct and management, will do much to keep men in important trust positions mindful of their obligations and the duties imposed by law.

Legislation along these lines, Mr. President, is the sort of emergency legislation most urgently demanded to prevent the recurrence of panics of the kind that terrorized the country last October.

I undertake to say, that, except the Special Interests—with whose predatory operations it might interfere—there would be found in behalf of legislation such as I have suggested a "substantial consensus of opinion."

This much could be done at once. To work out a thoroughgoing revision of our banking and currency laws will require preparation; I concede that.

A CURRENCY COMMISSION DEMANDED.

It is quite generally admitted that our currency and banking laws need revision. In my reading I have found no authority to the contrary. Throughout this debate there has run a note of apology and excuse for this bill; that it is, granting all that its author and friends claim for it, but an expedient for extreme and perilous situations. It is admitted to be a makeshift.

A review of the debates of recent years touching our banking laws shows that necessity for revision has long been recognized. The subject has recurred from time to time whenever forced upon the attention of the Senate by some financial or commercial disturbance, but not otherwise. Propositions are always forthcoming, timed to fit some particular trouble, calling for some specific action, and usually resulting in benefit to the Special Interests. It would appear that we might learn much from European countries in regard to bank management and currency legislation.

For my own part, Mr. President, I believe this subject one of supreme importance, requiring study and research, such as no committee of this body will bestow upon it. I do not believe that any other great nation in the world situated as we are would fail to create a suitable commission for investigation and report. Such a commission should be composed of men representing not the banking interests of the country alone, representing not the banking interests engaged in speculative banking at all, but representing commercial banking interests, representing transportation interests, representing producers and consumers, to which should be added a Government expert who has served in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and one or more eminent economists who have made a special study of Government finance.

WHAT THE BILL SHOWS ON ITS FACE.

Mr. President, in conclusion I would remind Senators that when the bill first came here the character of securities, especially railroad bonds, proposed as a basis for currency issue, was criticised. Their speculative and uncertain character was pointed out, and the absence of any safeguards in the bill as to the ascertainment of the value of the securities was called in question.

It was with manifest reluctance that for the time being the railroad provision was abandoned.

Will not this surrender of the main provision of the bill be looked upon as a confession that it was not defensible, and that the bill as a whole was of the same character?

It is still proposed to allow the issue of this emergency currency on other securities which the chairman of the Finance Committee a year ago arraigned in this Chamber as unstable and "widely fluctuating in value," and to create an inducement for honest bankers to go into financial banking and invest in these securities, in which the Senator then declared "no prudent banker could afford to invest."

Mr. President, this bill is of a piece with other legislation enacted in recent years. It is not concerned with the interests of depositors—the public interest. It does give added power and privilege to the financial banks. It does reduce reserve requirements for favored banks. It carries a provision for taxation of emergency currency that puts a premium on fraud. It did provide for working the securities of overcapitalized railroads into the currency system. It did propose to put a premium on railroad-rate extortion. It did attempt to give the banks a free hand for the contraction of the circulating medium. It sought to place the Government in an attitude toward the watered securities of railroads that would forestall railway valuation.

THE REAL ISSUE PRESENTED.

Mr. President, I have talked in vain if I have not made plain the thought that there is just one issue before the country today. It is not currency. It is not tariff. It is not railroad regulation. These and other important questions are but phases of one great conflict.

Let no man think he is not concerned; that his State or his constituency is not interested. There is no remote corner of this country where the power of Special Interests is not encroaching on public rights.

Let no man think this is a question of party politics. It strikes down to the very foundation of our free institutions. The System knows no party. It is supplanting government.

Mr. President, I think I may say without risk of being misunderstood, at least by those of whom I speak, that I know something of the sentiment of the people of this country.

I have found no difference of opinion among them as to existing conditions and the causes underlying it all. In Wisconsin, and from New York to the Pacific States, the people I have met hold one opinion, have one conviction.

They are deeply concerned. They understand. Men back of the System seem to know not what they do.

In their strife for more money, more power—more power, more money—there is no time for thought, for reflection. They look neither forward nor backward. Government, society, and the individual are swallowed up in the struggle for greater control. The plain man living the wholesome life of peace and contentment has a better perspective, a saner judgment. He has ideals and conscience and human emotion. Home, children, neighbors, friends, church, schools, country, constitute life. He knows very definitely the conditions, affecting the rights guaranteed him by the Constitution, but he longs for expression, he longs for leadership.

This makes plain, sir, the powerful hold of President Roosevelt and of Mr. Bryan upon the confidence and affection of the American people. This makes plain why the President and Mr. Bryan each have, not the Republican party alone, not the Democratic party alone, but the whole people in sympathy with their purposes.

Whatever the difference in party policy, whatever the difference in personality, they are striving, each in his own way, for certain fundamental truths that the American people demand shall be settled right, and shall be settled soon.

Whatever mistakes Mr. Bryan may have made in policies, whatever mistakes the President may make in compromising legislation, they are beloved of the people because they are both fighting to preserve, for the people, the principle of government, by the people.

Blind indeed is he who does not see what the time portends. He who would remain in public service must serve the public, not the System. He must serve his country, not Special Interests.

I believe this bill will strengthen the power that grows every day a greater menace to the industrial and commercial liberty of the American people. I believe this bill will strengthen the very element that is undermining the commercial banking of the country.

I appeal to the progressive men in the Senate not to allow this measure to pass; not to be misled by any false conception of party obligation. The highest official obligation is to serve the public interest.

APPENDIX.

Extracts from public records showing the participation of bank managers and directors in promotions and stockjobbing operations, with comment and explanation.

It is well known that there exists a community of interest between the large financial institutions of New York and the banking and other financial institutions of other large cities of this country. As the members of the directorates of the New York banks and the banks themselves are engaged in speculative flotations, so also are the directorates of large financial institutions in other cities of the country engaged in like transactions and have been and are associated with the great manipulators of the stock market of New York. In this connection I desire to call attention to the testimony of Edward H. Harriman before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The testimony which I give is taken from the print published at the instance of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, which certainly is not a source unfriendly to Mr. Harriman. It is taken from pages 23 and 24 of this report:

"Mr. KELLOGG. Was there a circular sent out asking for a deposit of stock of the Chicago and Northern Railroad Company for the purpose of selling it?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. My recollection is that Kuhn, Loeb & Co. issued a circular asking for a deposit of Chicago and Alton preferred, to be left in their hands to be sold under the control—I believe it was under the control, or under conference with a committee.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Who was the committee?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Myself—I beg pardon for putting myself first—I should have said Mr. Stuart (Stewart).

"Mr. KELLOGG. We do it.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. And Mr.—you have it there—I think it was Mr. Mitchell and myself—John A. Stuart (Stewart), John J. Mitchell, and myself, was it not?"

John A. Stuart (Stewart) is a director of the Merchants' National Bank and chairman of the board of trustees of the United States Trust Company of New York. Edward H. Harriman—I will not mention his railroad connections, but I desire here to mention a few of his banking connections—is a member of the board of directors of the National City Bank, the Night and Day Bank, and the International Banking Corporation, of New York. He is a trustee of the Equitable Trust Company, and director of the Guaranty Trust Company, and director of the Mercantile Trust Company. John J. Mitchell, of Chicago, is the president of the Illinois Trust Savings Bank of Chicago. He is also director of the First National Bank of New York. Mr. Walsh is also director of the New York Trust Company, of the Chicago and Alton, the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, the Kansas City Southern, the Rock Island Company, and the Pullman Company, so it can be seen how closely he is allied to Mr. Harriman in other ways than merely an interest in the banking business.

"Mr. KELLOGG. I offer in evidence an agreement dated December 23, 1903, for the deposit of Chicago and Alton stock. Under this agreement the preferred stock owners of the Chicago and Alton Railway Company, I believe, in a general way, are assumed to deposit their stock with the bankers, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., subject to sale?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That is right.

"Mr. KELLOGG. The price to be fixed by John A. Stuart (Stewart), Edward H. Harriman, and John J. Mitchell?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That is right

"Mr. KELLOGG. Did you fix the price at which that stock was sold to the Union Pacific Company?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I joined in it.

"Mr. KELLOGG. You joined in it?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Yes, sir.

"Mr. KELLOGG. What was the price fixed. Eighty-six and one-half, was it?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That is right.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Two and one-half per cent commission?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Well, we didn't pay 2½ per cent commission.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Well, taken out of that. Eighty-six and one-half was the gross sum paid?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Net price to the Union Pacific?

"Mr. KELLOGG. Net price to the Union Pacific; yes, sir. How much did the owners of the stock get?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Eighty-four.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Have you the list of stockholders who deposited their stock with Kuhn, Loeb & Co.?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I have not."

* * * * * * *

"Mr. KELLOGG. Who has the list?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That I don't know; that I had nothing to do with.

"Mr. KELLOGG. You fixed the price?"

* * * * * * *

"Mr. HARRIMAN. The committee fixed the price.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Did you own any that was so deposited?"

Mr. Harriman did not answer this question. Mr. Milburn, his attorney, entered an objection. The question involved the right of the executive officers of railroad companies to purchase stock of another railroad company as individuals and to sell that stock as individuals to themselves as executive officers of the railroad and the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission to inquire into such a transaction. Mr. Harriman did not answer, and only a few days ago, upon appeal, Judge Hough decided that he must answer this and other questions which will throw light upon the methods of these high financiers, of these trusted agents who have control of the banking machinery in this country.

I desire to offer some testimony given on pages 42 and 43 of the hearings of the Interstate Commerce Commission, February 25 to 28, 1907. I desire again to call attention to the banking connections of Mr. Harriman. Mr. Mortimer Schiff, of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., was a director of the Mercantile Trust Company, of the Provident Loan Society, and the United States Loan and Trust Company—one of the principal Standard Oil financial institutions; George J. Gould, the director of the National Bank of Commerce, the great Morgan institution; and James Stillman, the financier of the Standard Oil institutions, the president of the National City, and the director of the Bank of the Metropolis, Bowery Savings Bank, Columbia Bank, Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, The Fidelity Bank, The Fifth Avenue Safe Deposit Company, The Hanover National Bank, The Lincoln National Bank, The National Butchers and Drovers' Bank, The New York Trust Company, The Riggs National Bank of Washington, the Second National Bank of New York, and a member of the clearing-house committee of the New York Clearing-House Association. These, with Mr. Harriman, were members of a syndicate. The following is from the testimony:

"Mr. KELLOGG. In 1899 you organized a syndicate to buy the Chicago and Alton stock, did you not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Let me see. Was I the one that did that? I think so; I had a hand in it, anyway.

"Mr. KELLOGG. I think you did. That syndicate was composed of yourself, Mr. Mortimer Schiff, George J. Gould, and James Stillman, was it not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I am not sure about Mortimer Schiff.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Was it some representative of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Whatever was done was published at the time, and I presume you have all those papers. There was no concealment of what was done.

"Mr. KELLOGG. I understand that. I am only asking the general questions, Mr. Harriman. The statement shows that George J. Gould acquired 54,534 shares of stock, E. H. Harriman 54,535, Mortimer Schiff 54,535, and James Stillman 54,535. That is substantially correct, is it not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I think so.

"Mr. KELLOGG. There may have been a few shares in the names of directors. In other words, this syndicate acquired all but about $436,000?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. About 97 per cent, if I recollect right.

"Mr. KELLOGG. About 97 per cent, that is right, of the capital stock of the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company. That capital is about $21,000,000, is it not, par value?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I think it was $22,000,000.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Well, $22,000,000, par value. You became president of the company immediately thereafter, did you not, and were president for a short time—perhaps a year?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That I don't recollect—that I have ever been president of the Chicago and Alton.

"Mr. KELLOGG. The record shows you were president until Mr. Felton became president.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That may have been.

"Mr. KELLOGG. You were chairman of the board of directors or of the executive committee, or both—both, I think—until October last, were you not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That is so.

"Mr. KELLOGG. And during that time you had charge of the financial operations of the railroad company, did you?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Through the executive committee and board, yes, or subject to their control.

"Mr. KELLOGG. The property was bonded at that time—at the time you bought it—for about eight and a half millions, was it not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Something like that—eight and a half or nine millions.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; somewhere about eight and a half or nine millions. You immediately placed a mortgage of $40,000,000 upon the property, did you not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Yes; and sold $32,000,000 out of it.

"Mr. KELLOGG. You sold those $32,000,000 of bonds to the stockholders for $650 a bond, did you not, or 65 cents on the dollar?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That is right.

"Mr. KELLOGG. And this syndicate got substantially all of the bonds, all but about $436,000?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Was it that syndicate? I think there was a subsequent syndicate formed, composed of 100 different individuals.

"Mr. KELLOGG. No; I think the bonds were divided among that syndicate.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That is, it was divided with the stockholders, whoever they were.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; but the syndicate——

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Yes; I know, but that does not bear on this question. It is a question whether they did not represent a large number of subscribers to a syndicate other than themselves.

"Mr. KELLOGG. I do not know anything about that.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I think the records show that.

"Mr. KELLOGG. The record shows that the bonds were sold——

"Mr. HARRIMAN. To the stockholders.

"Mr. KELLOGG. To the stockholders, of which these four men whom I mentioned got substantially all?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. They were the largest holders; yes.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Eight millions of those bonds have not been sold, have they?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I think they have been pledged.

"Mr. KELLOGG. They have been pledged as collateral security to a $5,000,000 note of the railway company?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That is so.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Then $32,000,000 of those bonds were sold and substantially all of them went to these four gentlemen?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Went to the stockholders.

"Mr. KELLOGG. They were the stockholders, were they?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Went to the stockholders.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Well, these men were the stockholders, principally, were they not? There were no other stockholders except of small amounts?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. You have shown that. They had 97 per cent. They were the stockholders.

"Mr. KELLOGG. You sold some of those bonds immediately thereafter, did you not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I think not."

* * * * * * *

"Mr. KELLOGG. Did you sell your bonds?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Some of them.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Did you sell all of them?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I think I did.

"Mr. KELLOGG. And $10,000,000 of them went to the New York Life, did they not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I don't know whether they did or not?

"Mr. KELLOGG. Ten million dollars of them were sold for 96, were they not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I think they were. I don't know whether they were my bonds or not.

"Mr. KELLOGG. And thereby the stockholders, you gentlemen, reaped a profit of over $300 a bond? Is that correct?"

* * * * * * *

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I have not seen the list, Mr. Kellogg.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Very well. It purports to give the total number of shares of the Chicago and Alton Railroad as 222,102, and as owned by George J. Gould, 54,534, and the same amount by each one of the other three gentlemen, yourself, Mr. Schiff, and Mr. Stillman, and the amount of the $40,000,000 subscribed by each, amounting to $39,978,360 altogether, and you gentlemen subscribed for substantially all of it.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Thirty-nine million dollars?

"Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; originally subscribed for.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Oh, yes.

"Mr. KELLOGG. And you four gentlemen owned substantially all the stock?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. We were the Chicago and Alton Railroad, practically.

"Mr. KELLOGG. That is it; and you sold those bonds to yourselves for 65 cents on the dollar?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. We sold them to the stockholders, whoever they may be. I don't know whether other people were interested in mine or not."

* * * * * * *

"Mr. KELLOGG. As a matter of fact, the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company had paid its accumulated profits from year to year in the form of dividends at 8 per cent and over, had it not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. It had paid some of them.

"Mr. KELLOGG. The books of the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company showed no surplus of any considerable amount at the time you bought the property, did they?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That I don't remember.

"Mr. KELLOGG. As a matter of fact, they showed less than $200,000, did they not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. The books may have——

"Mr. KELLOGG. They did not show any $6,000,000 surplus, did it?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Mr. Kellogg, as I remember it, there was a recasting of the statements of the Chicago and Alton, and it was shown that there had been appropriated out of income to the Chicago and Alton, and expended on the road, more than $12,000,000.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. And this syndicate, or this body of stockholders, readjusted the finances of the Chicago and Alton and distributed to the stockholders about half that amount which had gone into the property from profits."

* * * * * * *

"Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact that from year to year, during the management of the prior Chicago and Alton, whatever had been charged against its income and spent upon the road had been closed each year by the board of directors?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I presume so, but under the former management the Chicago and Alton was drying up very fast, and so was the railroad itself.

"Mr. KELLOGG. It certainly has not dried up since.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. No, sir; it has not.

"Mr. KELLOGG. There was water enough to satisfy anybody.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Yes; and business enough to satisfy.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Would you think distributing $6,669,000 as a 30 per cent dividend to the stockholders who had already had 8 per cent would prevent if from drying up?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Combined with the other methods of financing which were adopted by the Chicago and Alton; yes.

* * * * * * *

"Commissioner CLEMENTS. Mr. Kellogg, what is the date of that 30 per cent dividend in that case?

"Mr. KELLOGG. The 30 per cent dividend was paid on May 7, 1900, shortly after the acquisition of the property by Mr. Harriman and his syndicate, $6,669,180. It may have been declared before. I think it was."

* * * * * * *

"Mr. KELLOGG. You understood, didn't you, that this $12,000,000 had already been charged against operating expenses?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I did not understand it at all. All I know was we went into the affairs of the Chicago and Alton and found that $12,000,000 of the profits of the company had been expended for improvements and additions to the Chicago and Alton Railroad.

"Mr. KELLOGG. And that $12,000,000 had been paid out of the earnings of the company, hadn't it?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Of course it had.

"Mr. KELLOGG. And while the company had paid 8 per cent dividends. That is true, isn't it?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Yes. Eight and 7, I think.

"Mr. KELLOGG. And was capitalized for $38,000,000 and carried its property on its books at $39,000,000? That is correct. I am speaking round numbers."

Now, what this testimony discloses is this: That a syndicate was formed, composed of these four men. These four men are bank directors, are the directing geniuses of some of the largest financial institutions of this country, institutions which in Wall street are rated high, institutions which have unlimited credit, which are supposed to be models of business honesty and integrity. These four men entered into a syndicate to acquire control of the Chicago and Alton road. They agreed to have the stock deposited with Kuhn, Loeb & Co. They secured 97 per cent of the stock, the absolute control of the road; they issued the bonds of the road and sold them to themselves at 65. They manipulated the stock and the officers of the company so that they resold these bonds at from 83½ to 96. They sold the bonds to insurance companies.

Edward Harriman was a director of the Equitable Life Insurance Company, one of the purchasers of these bonds. Mortimer Schiff, member of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., which firm was the financial agent that sold the bonds to the Equitable Life Insurance Company. Mr. Stillman was a representative of the National City Bank and its allied financial institutions.

After accumulating this stock, and becoming, as Mr. Harriman very aptly phrases it, "the Chicago and Alton Railroad," these men took the money which they paid to the Chicago and Alton Railroad—that is, to themselves—for these bonds and declared to themselves a 30 per cent dividend upon their stock. I desire to call attention to an exhibit which was submitted in the Harriman investigation and which will be found on page 134 of the printed testimony, and is as follows:

No. 65. Special common-stock dividend.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, N. Y., May 7, 1900.

Will pay to the order of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., syndicate managers, $5,562,900 (five million five hundred and sixty-two thousand nine hundred dollars).

CHICAGO AND ALTON RAILROAD COMPANY,
By FRED V. S. BROSBY,
Assistant Treasurer.

H. S. BRADT,
For the Secretary.

(Indorsed): Pay to the order of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. Kuhn, Loeb & Co. Pay to the order of the National City Bank. Kuhn, Loeb & Co.

"The other check, Exhibit 10, for the preferred-stock dividend is in the same words and form and is for $1,041,660. Both of them have like indorsements."

These indorsements are made to the order of the National City Bank—that is, these checks were made payable to that institution. James Stillman, a member of this syndicate, is the president of that bank, and if these checks and these exhibits show anything, they show that this national bank is engaged in this business for itself.

I have demonstrated that these men—such men as Harriman, Stillman, Schiff, Baker, and all of this crowd of high financiers that control the large banking houses in New York—control the national banks, that is, the large national banks of the system. They also control the principal railroads of the country. They should be concerned in conserving the property interests of the railroads for the benefit of the stockholders of these companies. That they have a greater concern in manipulating the stocks and securities of the companies that they may reap personal profits for themselves and their associates in the banking, trust, and security companies of which they are members, is evident from the manner in which the bull market was manipulated during 1904, 1905, and 1906. I wish to direct your attention to such testimony as is obtainable and which tends to show how this bull market was manipulated.

It is unfortunate that there was not conducted a general investigation and the testimony secured in regard to all of the railroad stocks which were dealt in and which were a part in this bull movement. But there is the testimony secured by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its investigation of the deals by E. H. Harriman and associates during this period. The evidence which I have quoted from the Armstrong report has relation largely to transactions of the old "blind pool" and to other transactions previous to the bull movement which started in 1904. The testimony which I now desire to quote shows that these men continued their operations up to and including 1906. The following is quoted from page 179 of the testimony taken before the Interstate Commerce Commission and shows how Harriman, Rogers, and Stillman and others began collecting in 1904 the stock of the Illinois Central, purchasing it in the market and concentrating it with the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.:

"Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Harriman, the company bought 281,231 shares of Illinois Central stock at that time, did it not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. If that is the amount. I suppose that is the amount.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Thirty thousand shares of stock from each of you, Mr. Rogers and Mr. Stillman?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Yes, sir.

"Mr. KELLOGG. For 175?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That is right.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Ex dividend?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That is right.

"Mr. KELLOGG. That sale was made on July 19, 1906, or about that time, was it not? That stock is now worth less than 160, is it not?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. The market value is apparently less than 160.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Was that a pool of stock, 30,000 each from you gentlemen?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I don't remember that.

"Mr. KELLOGG. How did you happen to own 30,000 shares each?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Well, we had bought it during a long time. We had acquired a certain amount of Illinois Central, bought it in the open market.

"Mr. KELLOGG. How long before that had you bought that?

"Mr. MILBURN. That comes, I think, within the objection.

"Mr. KELLOGG. He volunteered the information that he sold this stock to the Union Pacific. I did not ask him.

"Mr. MILBURN. I do not think he volunteered it.

"Mr. LOVETT. The record shows you asked him the question.

"The CHAIRMAN. He has stated, in giving his account of the transaction, that part of the stock of the Illinois Central that the Union Pacific acquired was his stock.

"Mr. MILBURN. There is no doubt about that; but that is in the record, and is fully stated, and there is no dispute about it. When we acquired it is another question. That, I think, is within the range of the objection I have made.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Let me ask a few questions in advance of that. Was that a pool?

"Mr. MILBURN. I think that is a purely private arrangement. Here are these gentlemen who own these shares in this corporation. The corporation takes the matter up. The ownership is disclosed. The corporation decides to buy. A committee is appointed to fix the price, and the price is fixed. Now, I think it is an entirely irrelevant and immaterial matter, entirely in the domain of private business, as to when they acquired that stock or for what they acquired it, or whether they acquired it separately or cooperating together.

"Commissioner HARLAN. Mr. Milburn, the record shows, as I understand it, that the motion to acquire this stock was made by Mr. Harriman.

"Mr. MILBURN. It shows that there was a report made on this matter, not a motion.

"Commissioner HARLAN. Very well; a report by Mr. Harriman.

"Mr. MILBURN. They did not vote on it, and a committee was appointed to fix the price of the stock.

"Commissioner HARLAN. I understand all that; but the report was made by Mr. Harriman. He was then an officer of the company, and put himself in the position of recommending the company to purchase his stock. Now, do you say that it is not proper for the Commission to know all the details of that transaction? That is, that he can act in one moment as an officer of the company and in another moment claim protection against full information as a private citizen?

"Mr. MILBURN. I do not think, if the Commissioner will excuse me, that that question is raised here. Here is an officer of a corporation, a director. He is also an individual. Now, there is no concealment; the matter comes before the board of directors with respect to a purchase of Illinois Central stock. Here is a director who says, 'I own these shares of stock;' and the company decides it is a good thing to buy them. He says: 'Because I own them, I can not act on this proposition.'"

Now, then, I wish to direct attention to another disclosure which is made by this evidence and which it all seems to me has bearing upon this bull movement—that is, to the increase in freight rates on the line over which Mr. Harriman and his associates have control:

"Mr. KELLOGG. Now, is it not a fact that within the last ten years nearly all products from the Atlantic seaboard to California have been increased 10 cents a hundred?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That may be. I had nothing to do with that.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Then the rates have not been reduced much, have they?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. In what time is that?

"Mr. KELLOGG. About 1904, just previous thereto. Do you know that from nearly all eastern points to all California points the rates on all classes of products, commodity rates, and other rates were increased substantially 10 cents a hundred?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. You will have to go to the traffic men for that. What were they in 1904 as compared with 1902 and 1901?

"Mr. KELLOGG. They were higher in 1904 than in 1902 and 1901.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. They were, eh?

"Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir. They were increased just prior to 1904. Now, here is the tariff with the increases. Do you wish to look at it?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I really don't know the reasons, but I presume that the prices of these very things that you spoke about have increased materially during that time.

"Mr. KELLOGG. The tariff I refer to is the westbound transcontinental freight bureau tariff.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I had nothing to do with that.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Of January 18, 1904.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. The tariff on all railroads on all commodities was alike.

"Mr. KELLOGG. On all Pacific railroads; certainly.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. I mean on all railroads from the Atlantic coast line to the Pacific; it don't make any difference which way they went.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, certainly not; that is all right.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Did it make any difference whether they went to Union Pacific or Southern Pacific or Great Northern?

"Mr. KELLOGG. They were increased on all of them.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. That does not bear on this question.

"Mr. KELLOGG. It bears on the reasonableness of your rates, and it bears upon the question of whether the rates have been decreased on the Pacific roads, as you say.

"Mr. HARRIMAN. There may have been reasons why they should have been increased. Is there any law against our increasing rates?"

The increased earnings which would come in a great measure from increased rates, the addition of 10 cents a hundred on all commodities between the Pacific and Atlantic would certainly increase the earning power of these roads.

Now, then, I wish to present the following evidence of another deal of Mr. Harriman and associates. On page 277 of the testimony will be found the following:

"Mr. KELLOGG. Of whom were the New York Central stocks purchased?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. They were purchased in the market through brokers and bankers.

"Mr. KELLOGG. Were any of the directors of the Union Pacific interested directly or indirectly in the New York Central stocks at the time they were sold?

"Mr. MILBURN. That is the same line.

"Mr. KELLOGG. I mean these particular New York Central stocks?

"Mr. MILBURN. Same objection.

"The CHAIRMAN. The same objections are made and they are overruled, and the witness declines to answer.

"Mr. KELLOGG. You decline to answer for the same reasons?

"Mr. HARRIMAN. Yes.

"Mr. KELLOGG. I mean at the time the Union Pacific bought these shares of New York Central stock, were any of the directors interested in the sale of those particular shares?

"The CHAIRMAN. It will be understood that the question relates to that time.

"Mr. KELLOGG. And the same position is taken?

"Mr. MILBURN. Yes; and the same answer."

Mr. Harriman declined to answer. It is clearly evident that Mr. Harriman and his associates, or at least that some of the Union Pacific directors, were interested in the sale of stock of the New York Central to the Union Pacific. Justice Hough has ordered that he should make answer to these questions.

Now, as illustrative of the speculative propensities of these men who are intrusted with the administration of the great properties of the railroad companies, and with the handling of the great funds of the insurance companies, and with the handling of the deposits of the people through their national and other banking connections, I desire to call attention to the testimony on pages 294 and 295:

"Mr. SEVERANCE. Now, from the time of the reorganization of the Union Pacific down, I might say, to the present time your bank has been the fiscal agent of the Union Pacific, has it not?

"Mr. KAHN. Yes.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. And still is?

"Mr. KAHN. Still is.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. That is, when they wanted to sell securities they sell them through you, and when they want to buy securities they buy them through you, as a rule?

"Mr. KAHN. Provided that we offer as good or better terms than anybody else.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. Well, we will come to that a little later. But, as a matter of fact, whatever may have been the inducements to do it, practically all the securities that have been puchased by—or a very large percentage of the securities purchased by the Union Pacific, and a very large percentage of securities sold by the Union Pacific, have passed through your hands, haven't they?

"Mr. KAHN. Yes. That is the practice in the case of all large railroad companies, that they deal with one particular banker.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. Yes; and you have been the particular banker of the Union Pacific?

"Mr. KAHN. Yes."

As evidence of the loyalty to trust which marks the dealings of these men, I desire to call attention to the testimony of Mr. Kuhn, member of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., pages 308, 309, and 310:

"Mr. KAHN. No. The one 2½ per cent was for the risk taken in acquiring the stock of the Southern Pacific, for the responsibility involving that, and for ourselves as fiscal agents. The other one we got for guaranteeing and insuring the success of an issue of $40,000,000 of 4 per cent convertible bonds at par, which was an untried issue and a new departure in finance. It was very questionable, indeed, whether 4 per cent convertible bonds on a road that had just emerged from bankruptcy would be salable at par or anywhere near it if it had not been for our active efforts and the syndicate's active efforts. I think I may also say if it had not been for the moral responsibility which we incurred in coming before the public and practically guaranteeing the goodness and soundness of the security, and that we received an additional commission. The two transactions are entirely separate, and the risk and responsibility involved are distinctly separate.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. And you got that commission of 2½ per cent, as I understand, for this moral responsibility, and the syndicate got 2½ per cent, practically a discount, of course, on the bonds for underwriting?

"Mr. KAHN. Yes.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. And $25,000,000 of the $40,000,000 were not taken by the syndicate at all or by you, but by the stockholders of the Union Pacific. That is in substance the transaction, is it not?

"Mr. KAHN. That is in substance the transaction; yes.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. So that the Union Pacific paid to you, with the exception of such amount as might have gone to the other members of your syndicate, these bonds and about 10 per cent commission, and the stockholders took about $25,000,000 of the bonds.

"Mr. KAHN. No; the Union Pacific paid us 2½ per cent commission upon the entire $40,000,000, and we ran the risk on the entire $40,000,000 that we undertook to underwrite at par.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. Yes; I understand the transaction. I was just getting at it.

"Mr. KAHN. I think it is a most unfair way of putting it.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. I do not mean to be unfair, Mr. Kahn.

"Mr. KAHN. I think you distinctly are, if you state we made 10 per cent.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. I do not mean to be unfair; I simply want to get in a nutshell the net figures, without reference to the explanation of why it is done.

"Mr. KAHN. That is unfairness. You can not get the net figures without the explanation of how it is done and why it is done.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. I think we agree on the figures, and your explanation will go with it. That is all right, Mr. Kahn. We will not have any trouble about that. Now, that money was paid over and the stock was acquired by the Union Pacific. A little later on, as I understand it, the Union Pacific bought some more of this stock. That was the next year, was it not?"

Now, this means that while Mr. Kahn said they got 2½ for one transaction and 2½ per cent for another transaction, it really means that Mr. Kahn's firm got 5 per cent on the sale price of the stock and that the syndicate composed of Mr. Harriman and his associates got 5 per cent on the sale price as a discount. That is, Mr. Harriman and associates were the Union Pacific Railroad, and they sold these securities to Mr. Harriman and associates, the syndicate, and they took 5 per cent of the sale price out of the treasury of the Union Pacific Railroad and paid it to themselves as the syndicate.

In the Harriman investigation it was also brought out that Kuhn, Loeb & Co. acted for the Union Pacific in the sale of large amounts of the securities of the Northern Pacific and Great Northern roads, and Mr. Kuhn, in his testimony on page 331, describing this transaction says: "We acted simply as the agents of the company in effecting the sales to the best of our ability, and I think I may say that we did pretty well and that we worked off a huge amount of stock, particularly without depressing the market, just as I may say we did pretty well in buying the Northern Pacific stock, because we paid about seventy millions of it before anybody had any idea we were doing it."

Now, what does this mean? It is direct evidence, as direct as exists, that these men, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the fiscal agents for the Union Pacific, the company that the Standard Oil-Harriman alliance deals with largely in the stock market, were engaged in the business of washing stocks. In other words, they were working the market. They were maintaining the prices by their washed transactions.

An additional proof of the manipulating methods used by these concerns I desire to quote from pages 232, 233, and 234 of the testimony:

"Mr. SEVERANCE. Later on, I see by this report, that a large amount of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific was sold through Kuhn, Loeb & Co.?

"Mr. KAHN. Yes.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. Was that sold under a contract?

"Mr. KAHN. May I ask under what date?

"Mr. SEVERANCE. It begins on the 17th day of last July and runs down to the 1st of February, 1907—the 17th of last July. I mean 1906.

"Mr. KAHN. There were direct purchases made from the company by us.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. What I wanted to get at, Were these made pursuant to a single contract, or were they various blocks sold from time to time?

"Mr. KAHN. They were in various blocks.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. And sold under the dates stated?

"Mr. KAHN. And sold under the dates stated.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. According to this there is a block of $2,800,000 of the capital stock of the Northern Pacific sold the 1st of February for five million nine hundred and fifty-four thousand and odd dollars.

"Mr. KAHN. What, a block of how much?

"Mr. SEVERANCE. That is what made me think that it must have been under some contract. That is a pretty high market price for Northern Pacific.

"Mr. KAHN. A block of how much? Two million eight hundred thousand dollars sold for $5,954,000? That is correct. We sold that at about 250. That would work out about right.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. For the Northern Pacific?

"Mr. KAHN. Yes.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. Are you not mixed up with the Great Northern?

"Mr. KAHN. No. We bought Great Northern from the company as high as 335.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. This is Northern Pacific.

"Mr. KAHN. And we bought Northern Pacific as high as 225.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. I am speaking about the 1st of February, 1907; this was only the other day.

"Mr. KAHN. The 1st of February, 1907?

"Mr. SEVERANCE. Yes; the 1st of February, 1907.

"Mr. KAHN. No.

"Mr. SEVERANCE. You certainly could not have paid over 200 for Northern Pacific stock then, could you?

"Mr. KAHN. No—yes; that is right.
"Mr. SEVERANCE. You paid 210 for it the 1st of February, did you, for Northern Pacific stock?
"Mr. KAHN. Yes.
"Mr. SEVERANCE. And that was an independent transaction, and not pursuant to any contract?
"Mr. KAHN. Yes; an independent transaction.
"Mr. SEVERANCE. Then, as I understand you, since last summer all of these sales that have been made to you were made in small or comparatively small blocks?
"Mr. KAHN. Yes.
"Mr. SEVERANCE. From time to time?
"Mr. KAHN. Yes—sales to us or the sales which were made through us?
"Mr. SEVERANCE. What?
"Mr. KAHN. Did you say the sales to us or through us?
"Mr. SEVERANCE. To you.
"Mr. KAHN. No; the sales to us were made in quite substantial blocks, and the sales through us were smaller blocks.
"Mr. SEVERANCE. They are quite substantial blocks, but they are smaller than some of the other blocks?
"Mr. KAHN. Well, but in the aggregate——
"Mr. SEVERANCE. They are in blocks of not less than 2,800 shares or more than a million?
"Mr. KAHN. Yes.
"Mr. SEVERANCE. Some of the sales last summer went as high as seven millions in some of the other stocks?
"Mr. KAHN. Yes."

Here this merely means that Kuhn, Loeb & Co. went into the stock market, sold securities owned by this company in small blocks, and the company would deliver the stock to them as called for. In other words, the company was engaged in open speculation through its bankers. The speculative end of this transaction is clearly proven by the fact that if Kuhn, Loeb & Co. were buying these stocks for investment for themselves or as representatives of any large syndicate they would have taken the amount of stock at one time in its entirety or in large blocks according to contract, whereas as shown by Mr. Kuhn's testimony they took the stock in small blocks from the Union Pacific Railroad as Kuhn, Loeb & Co.

As an illustration of the devious methods to which these men resort to cover up their dealings, I present the following from the Armstrong Report, volume 10, pages 72, 73, 74 and 75, and page 80:

"In 1902 the New York Life applied for a participation of $5,000,000 in the syndicate underwriting the securities of the International Mercantile Marine Company, known as the 'Navigation Syndicate,' of which J. P. Morgan & Co. were the syndicate managers, and received an allotment of $4,000,000. Upon this $3,200,000 was called in 1902, and this amount appeared in its annual statement for that year. In 1903 an additional amount of $800,000 was called, and in order that its interest in this syndicate, the prospects of which were not at the time particularly bright, should not appear at an increased figure in its statement for 1903, it was determined to make some disposition of the $800,000 interest. Accordingly, on December 31, 1903, it was arranged that J. P. Morgan & Co. should pay the New York Life $800,000, which was deposited to the credit of the company. The $800,000 interest was entered in its books as sold and the report to the insurance department stated that the company's entire interest in the syndicate was $3,200,000 instead of $4,000,000, and the value was stated at par, the price at which the $800,000 interest had been apparently disposed of. On January 2, 1904, the New York Life gave its check to J. P. Morgan & Co. for $800,266.67, that is, $800,000 and two days' interest. The arrangement was made by Mr. Perkins, who acted both for the New York Life and his firm. It is plain that there was no bona fide sale and that the whole purpose of the transaction was to conceal the extent of the company's interest in the Navigation Syndicate. The interest of $800,000 was closed out in 1904 at a loss of $80,000 to the company.

"In March, 1904, on the increase of the stock of the New York Security and Trust Company, 1,000 shares of the increased stock was used for the acquisition of the stock of the Continental Trust Company, which was subsequently merged with the former company. In connection with the carrying out of this plan objection was made to the large interest of the New York Security and Trust Company in the syndicate relating to the securities of the New Orleans Railways Company. Influenced, as it is claimed, by the argument that the New York Life had made an advantageous sale of its stock some two years before, and apparently with no other object than to assist the New York Security and Trust Company and those interested in it, the New York Life took from the trust company a participation of $2,500,000 in the New Orleans Railways Company Syndicate, and $1,500,000 in par value of the bonds of that company at 85, paying therefor, with interest, the aggregate sum of $3,805,679.55. This was an investment wholly without justification. The syndicate interest was afterwards transferred to and settled through the temporary loan account. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the bonds were sold at about 80 in November, 1904. On or about December 31, 1904, the remainder of the bonds, $1,250,000 in par value, were nominally sold for the apparent price of $937,500. In this way the bonds were closed out of the books of the New York Life and were not included in its annual statement as of December 31, 1904.

"The transaction was carried out as follows: One million dollars of the bonds, through an arrangement made by George W. Perkins, were sold pro forma to W. S. Fanshawe, a bond dealer with whom the New York Life had numerous transactions, for $750,000. The bonds were delivered to the New York Security and Trust Company, from which Mr. Perkins obtained the money without Fanshawe's intervention. The remaining $250,000 of the bonds were taken at the price of $187,500 by Mr. Perkins for the benefit of the 'Nylic' fund, a trust fund created for agency directors, of which Mr. Perkins was the managing trustee. On January 5, 1905, the subcommittee of the finance committee, composed of Messrs. Perkins, Langdon, and Randolph, reported, in connection with the 'New Orleans Railways interest referred to them with power,' 'that the proposed reorganization, although promising profitable results, involves the conversion of a portion of the bonds into stock, which could not therefore be entertained, and, in the judgment of the committee, made the sale desirable, to effect which involved a loss against which the committee provided in part by agreeing with the purchaser, in consideration of a division of the resulting profits upon the securities, to protect him against loss. The sale of $1,250,000 bonds at 75 was thereupon authorized on above basis.' On or about the same day Fanshawe took up the $1,000,000 bonds from the New York Security and Trust Company and the $250,000 bonds from 'Nylic,' paying the aggregate sum of $937,500, which at the same time was loaned him by the New York Life. He took them under an arrangement made with Mr. Perkins whereby the New York Life was to have 95 per cent of the net profits on their resale. In other words, Fanshawe merely agreed to take the bonds and sell them in his own name in consideration of 5 per cent of the net profits. The transaction was closed in June, 1905, when the securities were sold, and Fanshawe took up the loan and gave a check to the New York Life for 95 per cent of the excess over the price at which he had nominally taken them.

"Brief allusion may also be made to the manner in which other transactions in securities have been dealt with in the company's accounts. In 1898 the company took an allotment in the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway syndicate of $875,000, receiving bonds at par value and paying for them at 91, or $796,250. In July, 1899, the account was credited with $500,000 bonds as 'delivered to the New York Life at 99,' and these were transferred to another account then opened, which was debited with an equivalent amount, importing an investment in $500,000 of the bonds at 99. In fact, there had been no such investment, but the bonds were part of the lot acquired at 91. In December, 1899, the syndicate account was closed with an apparent profit of $44,908.96, which was carried to the credit of profit and loss, when in fact there had been no such profit. The transaction was simply that $500,000 of the bonds were marked up from 91 to 99, the company treating itself, on the one hand, as investing in them at the latter figure, and, on the other, as having made the profit by the resale.

* * * "It has been the boast of the company that it has made large profits in its dealings and securities. Its financial transactions, under the supervision of the finance committee, have been largely, including those already mentioned, in the immediate charge of George W. Perkins. On his becoming, in 1901, a member of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., his salary as an officer of the New York Life was reduced from $75,000 to $25,000, and he has testified that he has paid to the New York Life his share of the profits since made by his firm through his dealings with the company. The total amount paid by him to the company on account of such profits is $10,490.67, of which $10,412.57 was paid on December 30, 1903 ($9,730 through an offset of amounts claimed to have been disbursed by him for the company in the two prior years), and $78.10 on July 19, 1905. The explanation of the small amount paid by Mr. Perkins to the company on account of his share of the profits in these transactions is that they were high-grade securities yielding little profit to the firm, and that his interest in the firm was relatively small. The evidence is that while Mr. Perkins has been a member of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., the New York Life had purchased from it securities of the par value of $39,286,075 for the price of $38,804,918.51. Of these $3,657,000 in par have since been sold at a profit to the company of $35,131.25, and the market value of the remainder is stated to be $749,533.75 over cost.

"It has been the policy of the company not to limit itself strictly to investments. It has engaged largely in syndicate underwritings, and these, it claims, have been very profitable. Exclusive of its interests in the United States Steel Corporation syndicate, it states that its profits from syndicate participations have amounted during the past ten years to $2,399,695.22. It has been the practice, at least in recent years, to keep an account of profits from those sources in the ledger of the treasury department, against which have been entered sundry charges of syndicate losses and other items which it was convenient to charge against syndicate profits, such as $9,000 for furniture for the Hanover Bank office, and the balance has been carried to profit and loss in the general ledger."

To illustrate how lightly the obligations of a trusteeship rest upon these men, I desire to read from this same report, volume 10, pages 81 and 82:

"The company has also entered into numerous transactions on joint account, where the object was not to buy for investment, but for the purpose of early sale on a rising market. In other words, it has sought to take advantage of the financial connections and information of those charged with its financial operations by an approach, as close as possible, to the banking business. The course of business has been to make, with others, a joint purchase of securities, frequently furnishing all the money required in carrying the securities for the interest, and to divide the profits from the resale in agreed proportions.

"The company claims that its profits in cash and on bonds retired in connection with these ventures have amounted to $886,604.88. While it has made money for itself, it has given large shares of the profits to the bankers, who have used its money and attended to the business. Thus, in 1899, on a joint account with Goldman, Sachs & Co. and G. W. Bartholomew, the New York Life supplied upward of $2,000,000 for the purchase of $2,300,000 Missouri Pacific fives at 90; they were carried until September, 1900, when they were sold and the profits, after paying interest, were divided as follows: Eleven twenty-thirds, or $98,172.94, to Goldman, Sachs & Co.; one twenty-third, or $8,924.94, to G. W. Bartholomew, and eleven twenty-thirds, or $98,172.94, to the New York Life. In April, 1904, Chairman Perkins reported to the finance committee an 'offering by Kuhn, Loeb & Co. of about $3,000,000 Long Island Railroad Company refunding mortgage 4 per cent bonds, guaranteed by Pennsylvania Railroad at 98, accompanied by guaranty that our interest of $750,000 in syndicate through which said bonds are issued shall yield a profit equivalent to one-half per cent reduction in price of said $3,000,000 bonds. The chairman thereupon proposed to take the amount offered on those terms in joint account with William S. Fanshawe (he to surrender to us his own syndicate interest of $100,000)—$1,000,000 of bonds to be withdrawn as an investment for the company—which was approved.'

"Accordingly the New York Life supplied $2,984,590 for the purchase on joint account of $3,045,500 of these bonds at 99, less than 1 per cent, retired $1,000,000 at 97½, and the remainder was sold in June, 1904. The New York Life received the proceeds and paid over to Mr. Fanshawe $22,500 for his share, retaining $8,182.50 for its share of the profits. In 1904 the New York Life furnished the moneys for the purpose of purchase and sale on joint account with W. S. Fanshawe, of Chicago, Burlington and Quincy joint fours up to $1,000,000. Purchases were made in September and October at from 97 to 97½, and were sold from time to time in November, the account being closed with a profit of $4,656.20 to each party. There were numerous transactions of this general description, in some of which the other parties to the joint account carried their shares of the purchases, and the justification for the division of the profits is sought to be found in the command of expert services."

Is it reasonable to assume that George W. Perkins or George F. Baker or any other of these men will or are or can be any more faithful to their trusteeship as bankers than the evidence shows them to the trust which they assumed as officers of the insurance companies?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I was impressed with what the Senator from Wisconsin said about five minutes ago concerning the necessity for investigation. One thing has suggested itself to everybody, and that is the possibility that this bill might in some way delay the beginning of a thorough-going and scientific currency reform, which all men of all parties conceive is necessary.

I have thought of asking the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, who is the chairman of the Committee on Finance, what he thinks of the wisdom and expediency, in order that it may not be delayed, of a commission to investigate and to inquire into and give Congress the benefit of its deliberations upon this very grave subject.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate is a bill to provide an emergency currency for use whenever emergencies arise. It does not undertake to treat the general question of currency or of banking reform. I realize, and I have so stated to the Senate, the necessity of the immediate consideration and treatment of that subject, and I hope that before the present Congress adjourns legislation will be enacted which will provide for a commission, either a commission of Members of the House and Senate or a mixed commission, to consider this question, with a view of reporting at an early day in the future. It was not possible to do this at the present session. I think every Senator who listens to me realizes that fact.

Mr. President, it was my purpose to ask the Senate to take up the pending bill to-morrow and proceed with its consideration and reach a final vote some time during the day; but after a conference with Senators upon both sides of the Chamber, I will make the request now that the bill shall be taken up on Wednesday after the morning business and be considered on Wednesday and Thursday, and that a final vote shall be taken upon the bill and amendments before the adjournment on Thursday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be taken up for consideration at the close of the routine morning business to-morrow; that the consideration of the bill be proceeded with the residue of to-morrow's session and on Thursday following and that a vote be taken upon the bill, amendments pending and to be offered, before adjournment on that day. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am constrained to interpose an objection to that request. I believe this to be a measure of such importance that it should be debated out fully. It may be that Thursday or Friday or Wednesday will see the termination of that debate, but I have witnessed in my limited time in the Senate the disposal of important legislative measures where debate was cut off by unanimous-consent agreements and where Senators were denied the opportunity to reply to arguments made and to which reply was, as it seemed to me, of vital importance.

I remember when the rate bill was pending in the Senate the debate was curtailed by a unanimous-consent agreement and that with respect to certain propositions which I desired to present and argue out to the Senate I was foreclosed. I then said that no unanimous-consent agreement of like character would be made in my presence in this body while I remained here upon any important piece of legislation.

Now, let me say that it is not my purpose to prolong the discussion upon this measure at all. But I do want that latitude which shall yield to me, representing in part one State in this Union, the right to be heard here on any proposition and on any phase of this legislation whenever any argument may be made with respect to it, or the right to advance at any time when the bill is still pending before the Senate any further argument which it may occur to me as important to present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it is not my purpose, of course, to cut off any debate on amendments. I do not know of any Senator who desires to be heard upon this measure at length. I now give notice that to-morrow, after the routine morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill, and I shall ask that they proceed to the consideration of it to the exclusion of all other business until it is disposed of.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island whether that notice contemplates the limitation of debate?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not at all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I think the predicament which we are in is very clear to all of us. Notice now served by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] merely means that to-morrow and from that time on this bill must be considered to the exclusion of everything else so long as anybody has anything to say regarding it, and when nobody has anything to say, a vote must be taken upon the bill. In view of that fact, I now suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], whether it is not the more practical thing to do, as well as the thing which would perhaps be most acceptable to all Senators on the floor, to fix the date for a vote by unanimous consent—if Thursday is not satisfactory, then perhaps Friday.

I think that all will agree that the Senator from Rhode Island, no matter how much we may all have disagreed with him on this bill—and I have been one of those who have very earnestly disagreed on one feature of the bill, which has now gone out—must concede that he has not pressed the bill unduly, but has been very patient, indeed, in waiting until this time to ask for a unanimous-consent agreement.

The bill has been before the Senate—it is now practically the 1st of April—since the holiday recess, which is quite a long time. I should not interpose this suggestion, which is made, as I think the Senator from Wisconsin will perceive, with the utmost desire to produce some practical result, if there had been a dispositon to press things here. I think, further, that everybody will concede that one of the objections which has been in the minds, not only of Senators, but of the country, that this legislation might put off a thorough-going reform of this whole great subject has been very largely obviated by the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island in favor of a commission to investigate and report upon this subject.

But the object in my rising at this juncture is to suggest whether it is not more expedient, instead of meeting to-morrow and going right on and voting upon this bill only when no Senator has anything further to say, to fix, as is the custom of the Senate, a day—no matter how far distant, and if Thursday is not agreeable, then Friday or Saturday—to vote upon it.

I offer the suggestion for what it may be worth. I do not know whether it is acceptable to the Senator from Rhode Island or to the other side.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, so far as the suggestion which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] makes about the commission, that can take care of itself, but I remind the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] of the fact that before Christmas a resolution was introduced and referred to his committee—the Committee on Finance—to make an inquiry into the causes of the panic and to report such legislation as, in the judgment of the committee, might prevent a recurrence of such conditions. That resolution is still in that committee.

With reference to the suggestion about a vote, it appears to me, on inquiry on this side of the Chamber, that no other Senator on this side desires to address the Senate at any considerable length. I was therefore of the opinion that taking to-morrow and the next day for the consideration of amendments and the bill itself, it would probably afford all the necessary time for the submission of remarks by Senators who desire to speak either on amendments or on the general bill.

It ought to be recalled that in the proposal of the Senator from Rhode Island the debate is not limited, as is often the case, to the five-minute rule, the ten-minute rule, or the fifteen-minute rule. Debate is to be general and unlimited on the amendments and on the bill; nor is an hour on Thursday proposed to be fixed for the final vote; in other words, so long as any Senator on Thursday desires to be heard upon this bill, he can be heard under the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, and must be heard, notwithstanding the length of the session on that day.

I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that, under all the circumstances, the proposal made for the final vote on Thursday, not at any particular hour, but before adjournment on that day—of course we can hold the session until midnight or even longer if any Senator desires to be heard—would in all likelihood meet any emergency that might probably arise.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I do not know of any Senator on this side of the Chamber who desires to take any part in this discussion at any length, and I thought the proposition which I made was exceedingly liberal. There is no disposition to cut off debate or to cut off amendments in any form. Therefore I hope that the Senator from Wisconsin will, upon consideration, withdraw his objection, as there is certainly no intention to cut that Senator or any other Senator off from any course of proceeding which he may see fit to adopt.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it seems to me that with the chairman of the Finance Committee in control of the time when the Senate shall be required to consider this legislation he can hasten it to a conclusion, sitting at such hours as in his wisdom the Senate ought to be required to devote to it. I can see no reason why this legislation should not be considered by the Senate, amendments offered and debated as their importance may require, and voted up or voted down without having the stake set at some fixed time when there shall be no further discussion. Supposing it shall occur to someone to offer an amendment of vital importance at the last moment, debate being cut off on it by the limitation fixed by the unanimous-consent agreement, which can not be revoked.

This is very important legislation. I know of no reason why it should not run its course. As I have said to the Senator from Rhode Island, I have no disposition to prolong the consideration of this bill beyond giving it careful, full, and complete consideration.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I see no trouble with the suggestion made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], that we meet to-morrow to consider amendments, and when amendments are disposed of to take a vote on the merits of the bill.

As has been stated by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and by the Senator from Rhode Island, no Senator on either side of the Chamber desires to speak at length upon the bill. Now, unless it is developed, on a consideration of these amendments, that some Senator wants to talk against time, I for one see no reason why we can not dispose of all the amendments to this bill to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, there has grown up in this Senate quite a custom of fixing a time for a vote on pending legislation. I have never felt very much in sympathy with that custom, and I am rather glad to have the discussion on the pending bill go along in its regular way. I am confident we shall be able to vote on the bill as early as suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. ALDRICH]. If he will keep the bill to the front, and it be understood that he will object to the intervention of any other legislation—which I want to say now I am going to do, no matter how important it may be—if he will keep this bill before the Senate, I think we can finish it before adjournment on Friday night.

Mr. President, I expect there will be a great many amendments offered to the bill. Certainly, after listening to the Senator from Wisconsin, who has portrayed in vivid colors the enormities of this bill and described what it lacks, and who seems to think we ought to take up the entire financial system, although he has ignored the fact that some of the things of which he has complained are already provided in the statutes, such as penal sentences for certain banking derelictions, I shall expect that Senator to avail himself of the universal freedom of this Senate to give us his views on all these questions in the way of amendments. I presume somebody will want to talk about them for a few minutes, perhaps, or at least some Senator may ask for a yea-and-nay vote of the Senate, and it will take a little time to vote the amendments down, for I have no doubt that most of them will be voted down, because this bill does not provide for a reorganization of the banking system, and nobody supposed it would, although the Senator from Wisconsin seemed to think it ought.

I have said, and I think it is apparent to everybody, that the purpose of this bill is simply to meet emergencies that may arise, as they have existed heretofore and are likely to exist again. This is not a good time to attempt a reorganization of the banking system.

I do not believe myself in the advisability of the appointment of a commission to investigate this subject. I believe the Senate is as able to take up the financial question when we reach it and determine how we should change the present banking system, if we are going to change it at all, as any commission can be.

My experience with commissions, Mr. President, has not been such as to make me very strongly in favor of them. You may appoint a commission of six or eight men, and each man will have his own views, and when you come back here you will be at sea just as you are now. The Senate ought to be capable of taking up the financial question and considering it in a very conservative and careful way. That is what you have got to do, but you will not do it at this session, I am sure, and nobody expects you can. If you appoint a commission, you will not enact such legislation at the next session.

We are going to be faced, Mr. President, at the next session with an asset currency bill. It may not get through the other body at this time; but it is like the poor, you will always have it with you. It will be here because the banking interests of this country have made up their minds that, if there is anything that is good for them, it is an asset currency. I do not wonder at that. I can understand how a bank having a lot of paper, some of it good and some of it bad, would like to issue bills and send them over the country. They want of course—it is a part of the programme—that the Government shall guarantee these bills. There will never be in this country a new banking system that shall depart from the present system if the Government is going to guarantee the paper so put out, and asset currency goes upon the theory that when a bank has exercised its judgment and issued all the paper it thinks it can issue the Government is to stand back of it.

Mr. President, I am quite content with this matter as it is. I believe we can get through and have a fair discussion, and, if we do not, we can extend it into Friday or even Saturday, I suppose.

Mr. ALDRICH obtained the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I prefer to wait, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it has been the habit of the Senate for very many years, after discussion upon a measure was practically exhausted, to fix a time for taking a vote. This custom has grown out of a universal necessity, due to the pressure of public business in this body and the absence of a rule for the previous question. In making the suggestion which I did, I have followed the usual custom in such cases. I think no Senator can complain that there has been any attempt, on my part, to press this measure unduly. I shall, as I said before, ask the Senate to proceed to consideration of the bill, and I shall feel constrained to object to the consideration of any other business until this measure is disposed of.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Rhode Island simply gives notice that at 2 o'clock to-morrow——

Mr. ALDRICH. No; immediately after the morning business.

Mr. CULBERSON. This bill is the unfinished business.

Mr. ALDRICH. My notice was that immediately after the routine morning business I should ask the Senate to consider this measure and proceed with the consideration of it until it is disposed of.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall occupy the floor only a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator from Idaho.

I merely wish to say, in reply to the observation of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], that I have exercised what I conceive to be a right upon this floor to speak upon this bill and to speak my mind upon it. I do not think I have misconceived the bill or the purpose of it or the effect of it. I do not understand it to be, Mr. President, a revision of the currency and banking laws of the country. I understand that for many years the necessity of such revision has been recognized. I understand that you can not get a revision succeeding a panic, because there is a disturbed condition, and you can not get such a revision in a time of industrial prosperity and peace, because there is no necessity for it.

As to whether I shall offer any amendments to this bill, I will be governed in that, too, by what seems to me to be the right thing for me to do at the time, and I shall not be influenced at all by any consideration as to whether those amendments are voted up or voted down.

I have listened to all the suggestions that have been made here with respect to curtailing debate and fixing a time to vote upon the bill, and no suggestion has been made which leads me to withdraw my objection.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I did not mean any reflection upon the Senator from Wisconsin. I have listened to every word the Senator has said, I believe, in his speeches, and it occurred to me that if he found so many errors in the bill he would exercise the right of every Senator on this floor to move amendments. Whether they prove popular or acceptable to the Senate will be another question, but nobody usually cares about that until at least a vote has been taken, although sometimes one may feel a little bit hurt if an amendment does not succeed.

I in nowise intended to reflect upon the Senator from Wisconsin, and if the defects in the bill are such as he declares, I hope he will take the sense of the Senate on them, because if there are such defects, then we ought to vote amendments in, and if we do not think they are defects we will vote the amendments down.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is very evident that we can not now reach a unanimous conclusion upon this subject, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the Senator will withhold that motion for a moment. I have but a word to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ALDRICH. I withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think, in the interest of good government and wise legislation, that when a question has been thoroughly discussed in this body, or any other legislative body, it should come to a vote, and I am not at all inclined to do anything that would postpone that vote after a bill has been thoroughly considered. I think, however, if the request of the Senator from Rhode Island is to be considered at this time, that it ought to specify in some detail the time to be devoted to the consideration of amendments and the time that might be occupied by any Senator in discussing an amendment or in discussing the bill. I shall offer no objection to the fixing of a time for the final vote upon the amendments or upon the bill as amended. I believe that when the time comes the Senate should speak its sentiments and that there should be such a consent given as would enable this to be done.

I was rather startled at the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island in regard to the appointment of a commission. Under no circumstances and at no time am I in favor of delegating to any outside body of men or any man the duty of advising us as to legislation. The Committee on Finance of this body is quite capable of determining and presenting to the Senate whatever is important to be considered in this body for the country, and I should certainly not favor at any time the appointment of any commission to advise us. We have a most competent commission in the Finance Committee of this body and the appropriate committee of the other body of Congress.

Mr. President, I think that the request of the Senator from Rhode Island ought to divide the time for the consideration of this question and that an hour should be fixed. Otherwise, as has been suggested, at the last hour some motion or suggestion might be made that we would all deem it important to consider. I suggest that the request should be to fix an hour at which the vote should be taken upon amendments, the time that should be consumed in the debate, and the time when a vote should be taken upon the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Under the notice that has been given, the bill is to be taken up, as I understand, and the amendments to be considered, and there is no limitation, either in the consideration of the bill or in the consideration of the amendments, but every Senator will have as much time as he desires to speak upon the merits of the bill or any one of the amendments that is proposed. If, after everybody supposes that we are through with the consideration of the bill, another amendment is offered, that can be debated and voted on also.

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, unfortunately a legislative day has a legal termination, and that hour upon which a legislative day expires is one that we can not very well change, and it is so convenient to fix an hour that it seems to me it would obviate that question. We might be called upon to sit here until 12 o'clock on Friday—that is, sit all night Thursday—for the purpose of carrying into effect the agreement suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. Personally I should have preferred very much to have a limit put upon the debate and upon amendments and to have had a time fixed for the final vote, but, knowing that that certainly would be objected to, I made the proposition which I did in the most liberal way in which it was possible to make it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that he probably will meet with no more opposition to a resolution or motion carrying the details than he would meet to a general resolution or motion, and it certainly would work out better in the end.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will try at some future time to carry out the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope so.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that there is a desire for an executive session, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 25, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 24, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers as a matter of privilege the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 23, 1908, be corrected by striking out, on pages 3835, 3836, and 3837, the speech purporting to have been delivered March 18, 1908, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and inserting in lieu thereof the transcript of the notes of the Official Reporters of the House of the speech actually made by said gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. SULZER. But I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. I will withdraw the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is offered for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has put in yesterday's RECORD a speech reflecting upon the intelligence of most of the Members of this House. The speech was never delivered, and he never uttered one single word of it on the floor of this House. The official stenographer's notes show that the gentleman got up on the 18th of March and asked "leave to extend his remarks." What remarks? [Laughter.] This morning, lo and behold, we found on the first page of yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech by the "Hon. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, in the House of Representatives, Wednesday, March 18, 1908." And he says in this speech:

Indeed, I think it may be truly said that there are comparatively few Members of the House itself, much less outsiders, who have any real knowledge of the rules. The rules are simple enough and entirely logical, but to the majority of Members of the House who have no special ambition to familiarize themselves with them they seem complicated.

"Any real knowledge of the rules!" Now, think of that! Think of the gentleman from Pennsylvania slipping this undelivered speech into the RECORD and saying "Very few Members have any real knowledge of the rules." "The rules," he says, "are simple enough and entirely logical, but to the majority of the Members of the House who have no special ambition to familiarize themselves with them they seem complicated." Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania pays his respect to the newspaper reporters and magazine writers and some others "who, without unfairness, it may be said have very little knowledge or any conception of what they are writing about."

Think of that for an illustration of assumed wisdom.

This speech is not only a reflection on the intelligence and assiduity of the majority of the Members of this House, but reflects on the newspaper correspondents who sit in yonder gallery. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

A short time ago in the German Reichstag a member said something derogatory of the newspaper correspondents and they went on a strike, and now the world knows absolutely nothing about what the members of the German Reichstag are doing. If the gentlemen of the press gallery do not go on a strike to rebuke the gentleman from Pennsylvania I shall be very much surprised. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman got unanimous consent to extend his remarks, and I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will tell us what remarks he made. I hope the gentleman will consent, in all fairness, to strike out the derogatory parts of his speech reflecting on the Members of this House and on the newspaper correspondents.

This resolution is presented by me this morning to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offered a resolution yesterday to strike out of the RECORD a part of my speech which I had actually delivered on the floor of the House, and I would have delivered all of it if I had been allowed the time, but I could not get the time, and under the circumstances did the best I could, and when my time was exhausted I asked the House for unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and the House granted it, and then the next day the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moved to strike out everything I did not actually say on the floor of the House.

Now, sir, I call the attention of the country to what I consider a great abuse of the rules and privileges of the House of Representatives, and that is the practice of putting into the RECORD speeches and data which have never been spoken, and never been heard on the floor of the House. It is an abuse that should cease. Yesterday, sir, I served notice on the House that if the Republicans struck out a part of my speech, which reflected on nobody, which did nobody an injury, which simply narrated the record of this House, in future I would see to it that nothing went into the RECORD by unanimous consent, and I am doing this not alone to please myself but I am going to do it in the interests of the newspaper correspondents, in the interests of the official reporters of the House, and in the interests of public economy, so that the poor fellows down in the Government Printing Office will not have to work quite so hard; and I now reiterate that nothing hereafter will appear in the RECORD, so far as I am concerned, unless it is actually delivered on the floor of the House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. DALZELL. About three minutes.

Mr. SULZER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman. [Laughter.] I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, with respect to a portion of what the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] has said, I quite agree. I believe that the practice of printing in the RECORD speeches that were not delivered is a bad practice, and I shall agree to cooperate with the gentleman hereafter in suppressing that sort of literature. My speech, purported speech, in the RECORD this morning was put in there pursuant to leave granted by the House on the 18th of March, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show. It reflects on nobody and contains, as the House will observe, no little interspersed applauses either on the Democratic or the Republican side. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I am content to take the judgment of the House on this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULZER) there were—ayes 21, noes 131.

So the resolution was rejected.

EFFICIENCY OF MEDICAL DEPARTMENT, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The Speaker laid before the House the bill (S. 1424) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army, with House amendments thereto disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendment to the Senate bill and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chair announced the following conferees on the part of the House:

Mr. YOUNG, Mr. CAPRON, Mr. SLAYDEN.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill be taken from the Speaker's table, that the House disagree to the Senate amendments thereto, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference thereon. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19158) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of my colleague, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB], I would like to arrange, if I can, the time for general debate, and I will ask the gentleman whether four hours on a side would be satisfactory to him?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, we would like very much to have more time, but in view of the fact that we must economize in time now we will have to consent, trusting to borrowing some time from the other side, and to getting what time we can have under the five-minute rule on this side.

Mr. SCOTT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to eight hours, to be divided equally between the majority and the minority, to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to eight hours, to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas and by the gentleman from Virginia. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to state that this is a most important bill, and there are a great many Members who desire to be heard in general debate, and when this important bill is taken up I see no reason why the debate should be limited to four hours on each side. It seems to me there ought to be at least three or four days of general debate; we ought to have at least eight or ten hours on each side. I will ask the gentleman if he could not agree to three days' general debate on the bill?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I think my friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] may perhaps rely upon the judgment of the ranking member of the minority of the committee, and since he has suggested that eight hours would be satisfactory, I hardly feel as if I could agree to a longer time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do rely upon the judgment of the gentleman, and dislike very much to take issue with him; but I know there are some gentlemen who desire to engage in general debate on this bill, and four hours will not be enough. There are a number of the members of the committee on the minority side who wish to make speeches, and this will not give them an opportunity.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to say to the gentleman from Texas that this matter has been pretty carefully canvassed, and I think eight hours will suffice for all gentlemen who wish to discuss the bill to be heard, and I desire to renew my request.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, unless the gentleman will agree to at least six hours on each side I shall feel constrained to object.

Mr. SCOTT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that we go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19158, the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19158, the agricultural appropriation bill, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19158, the agricultural appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as folows:

A bill (H. R. 19158) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill and read to page 6, line 6.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas renews his motion that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in addition to the formal report which accompanies this bill, I desire, with the indulgence of the committee, to submit a few observations upon some special features of the bill and perhaps upon some of the work of the great Department for the support of which it is intended to provide.

First of all, I desire to correct an impression which seems to have become prevalent that the total amount carried by this bill is in excess of the estimates submitted by the Department. It is true that the Book of Estimates presents but $10,666,351 as the estimates from the Department of Agriculture, but supplemental estimates were subsequently sent to the House which brought the total up to $12,851,351. The present bill carries $11,431,346, so that instead of being in excess of the estimates it is below them by $1,420,005. The increase of this bill over the appropriations for the current year will be found less than the average increase during the past ten years, and your committee believes it is a thoroughly conservative and carefully drawn bill.

The report notes briefly the fact that the volume of the bill has been reduced from 69 to 49 pages. This reduction has been made by an elimination of redundant and unnecessary verbiage, and has not limited the scope of the work of the Department or changed its character in any degree. The changes have been made merely to simplify the bill so that its provisions may be more easily understood.

Your committee has recommended very few promotions in salary, and these only in exceptional and uncommonly meritorious cases.

Under the Weather Bureau the bill recommends the construction of a new building at Abilene, Tex.; Dodge City, Kans.; Richmond, Va.; East Lansing, Mich.; Northfield, Vt.; St. Joseph, Mo., and Fort Wayne, Ind. It also recommends the reestablishment of the station at Pikes Peak and restoration of the administration building at Mount Weather, which was destroyed by fire last October.

The recommendation for the construction of buildings at the various stations named is made in pursuance of what your committee believes to be the wise policy of the Bureau to house its employees in its own buildings as rapidly as these buildings can be economically constructed. The value of meteorological observations is greatly enhanced if they can be taken at the same place over a long period of years. Your committee believes it is good policy, therefore, to build permanent homes for the stations wherever the stations themselves are to be permanent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any special construction that is necessary in these weather buildings that demand special quarters in order to have efficient service?

Mr. SCOTT. It is necessary, chiefly, that they should be located so as to be free from the influence of adjoining buildings, and it is necessary also that the roofs should be of such shape that instruments may be placed on them which will be easy of access by the observers in charge of the station.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give the committee roughly the number of stations which are located in rented quarters and the number that are in quarters owned by the Government?

Mr. SCOTT. I can not even approximate that, as the matter has never been brought to my attention. I may say it has been the policy of the Bureau for several years to construct these buildings, and the agricultural appropriation bill most of the time for the past six years, since I have had the honor of being on the committee, has carried appropriations for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Aggregating how much in amount annually?

Mr. SCOTT. The cost of these buildings ranges from $12,000 to $15,000, and provision has been made——

Mr. STAFFORD. Independent of the sites?

Mr. SCOTT. Including the sites; and provision has been made in the different bills for sometimes four and sometimes eight buildings.

Mr. STAFFORD. What percentage are in Government buildings and what in rented quarters?

Mr. SCOTT. You mean in their own buildings?

Mr. STAFFORD. In the buildings owned by the Government.

Mr. SCOTT. I should think perhaps 20 per cent are in their own buildings.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give any rough estimate as to the amount of appropriation that would be needed in case they were housed in buildings owned by the Government?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, there are about 200 stations. It would cost about $15,000 a station. About 70 or 80 per cent of them are as yet unsupplied, and the gentleman can make the computation himself.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it possible to have these stations located in the usual Government buildings such as we construct for use of post-offices and other governmental purposes?

Mr. SCOTT. The Chief of the Bureau does not recommend that, for the reason that the buildings are very seldom so constructed as to be suitable for the use of the Weather Bureau.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can not some quarters in those buildings be arranged whereby they would be suitable for the purposes of the Bureau?

Mr. SCOTT. I suppose, of course, if the matter were taken into account when they were constructed, it might be done, but, as the gentleman knows, the construction of the Weather Bureau buildings is under the control of the Department of Agriculture. Other public buildings are constructed by the Treasury Department, so that there has been no coordination of that sort.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of my inquiry was that here we have these buildings being constructed under the Department of Agriculture, that has immediate charge of them, while the Government buildings that are mostly used for post-office purposes through the country are under the charge of the Treasury Department——

Mr. SCOTT. I may say to the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. Over which the Post-Office Department has no control whatsoever, and wherein the buildings are erected without regard and oftentimes in opposition to the plans and recommendations and ideas of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SCOTT. I may say to the gentleman that, as a general proposition, the Weather Bureau prefers to have its observers live in the stations, and of course that would be wholly impracticable in a post-office building.

In regard to the building at Mount Weather, Va., as Members of the House doubtless know, there has been established at that point a research station, the purpose of which is to carry on new and original investigations with a view to widening the realm of knowledge upon which the service of the Weather Bureau is based. Very little progress has been made in the science of meteorology for a great many years. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and we hear the sound thereof, but whence it cometh or whither it goeth" is about as much of a mystery now as it was when the Master talked with Nicodemus nineteen hundred years ago.

We are spending about a million and a half of dollars annually to make forecasts of the weather and distribute them, and yet if we can forecast the weather any more accurately now than twenty-five years ago it is chiefly because our agents have become more skilled in the application of the old principles and not because any new principles have been discovered. Your committee believes, therefore, that it is a good policy to spend a few thousand dollars each year in researches which may, we hope, broaden the science upon which the art of forecasting is based. Now, the station at Mount Weather consists of about half a dozen buildings, and the administration building, which was destroyed by fire last October, is an essential part of this plant. Your committee has, therefore, recommended an appropriation for its restoration.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to know how much of the $1,500,000 would be expended for buildings.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, in the present bill there is carried an appropriation of $60,000 for the restoration of this building at Mount Weather, and for a general power plant for that station, and then we have $105,000 for buildings at other stations, making altogether $165,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Do you not think that a great deal of this money could be saved by utilizing the post-office buildings in the various sections of the country, notwithstanding the fact that the Department thinks it advisable not to use them?

Mr. SCOTT. Why, no. I do not think it would be practicable. That matter has been canvassed frequently before the committee, and the committee has been unanimously of the opinion that the reasons given by the Bureau why that should not be done are satisfactory and conclusive.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell us what the reasons were?

Mr. SCOTT. One reason was that the post-office buildings are seldom located at the proper place. Frequently they are surrounded by higher buildings; they are right in the heart of the city; the architecture is not such as to make them convenient for the observers to place their instruments on the roof and take their observations. And still another reason is that it would be impossible to house the observer and his family in the post-office buildings, and that is almost essential in all the smaller stations where only one man is employed.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I would like to ask why it is essential to house the observer in the building used by him?

Mr. SCOTT. Because he ought to be on duty twenty-four hours of the day.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, he is to be something like a Pinkerton detective that never sleeps?

Mr. SCOTT. He is to have an opportunity to sleep; but, like a physician, he is to be called up if the need arises.

In the Bureau of Plant Industry a rearrangement of the language has been made, by which the grain investigations heretofore carried as a separate item shall be covered into the general work of the Bureau, and new language has been inserted to provide that when fixed grades have been established they shall constitute the official standard for the grading of grain. Lack of uniformity in grain grading throughout the country has long been a subject of complaint, both by the producers and the purchasers of grain. Some three years ago, in consequence of these complaints, an appropriation was inserted in the agricultural appropriation bill to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to undertake an investigation, from which it was hoped a method would be devised for bringing about uniform grain grading. These investigations have not been entirely successful, but very encouraging progress has been made. A mechanical device has been perfected, by means of which the water content of grain, one of the most important factors in its grading, can be quickly and accurately determined, and this device is now in use in many of the great grain markets.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to ask if it is proposed to have the Federal Government assume jurisdiction of inspection over all the grain shipped in this country?

Mr. SCOTT. I would say to the gentleman that it is in the hope of preventing that very thing that your committee has recommended that this investigation be carried on. We believe that as a result of this investigation methods will be devised whereby a uniform system of grain grading may be established throughout the country, to be put into effect by the present boards of inspection, so that the Government will not be obliged to yield to the demand which the gentleman knows is becoming more and more insistent every year to undertake Federal inspection.

Mr. MADDEN. Just what has the Government done so far to secure information upon which to base inspections as to uniform grading of grain?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, I was just stating that as a result of these studies it has devised this mechanical apparatus for determining the water content of grain. It has made progress in the development of apparatus for testing other factors that enter into the grading of the grain, and it is believed by the officials in charge of the work that the problem ultimately will be solved.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no disposition to establish boards of inspection to take the place of the boards of inspection that exist now in the various cities?

Mr. SCOTT. There is no proposition to establish any board of inspection.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. SCOTT. For a similar reason we have incorporated in this bill a new paragraph authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to establish a standard for the different grades of cotton. To fix the standard of cotton is a much simpler thing than to determine the grade of grain, for the reason that it is largely a mechanical matter, depending on the length of the fiber, its color, luster, and so forth.

Nevertheless the number and names of the various grades in use in the cotton markets of the country have given rise to innumerable disputes between buyer and seller, so that both producers and manufacturers of cotton have earnestly appealed to your committee to authorize the Secretary to determine and declare what shall be the standard for certain grades of cotton named in the bill.

It is believed that when these grades have been fixed sets of actual samples can be prepared and sent out to the various markets, by means of which practical uniformity can be brought about throughout the entire country.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a question or two?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I regard the provisions of the bill that the gentleman is now discussing as of very great importance indeed, and I have not as yet reached the conclusion that I shall support them when the bill is up for consideration. Now, in relation to the official standards of cotton, the gentleman has explained to the committee about the controversies which often arise between the shipper and the consignee, or the seller and the buyer, respecting the grading of cotton.

Will not substantially the same controversy arise as to whether the cotton shipped comes up to the official standard or goes below? Will it obviate in any considerable measure the differences of views and the controversies that exist between the seller and the buyer, by the fixing of an official standard, unless the Government proceeds to establish a tribunal that will inspect and determine the quality of every particular shipment of cotton? And does it not necessarily lead to Government inspection of cotton and all other kinds of commodities?

Mr. SCOTT. I think the controversies which arise under the present system are due chiefly to the great difference in the number and names of the grades of cotton at various markets. For instance, at the New Orleans market they may have only nine grades of cotton, in the New York market there may be thirty grades of cotton, and the difference in the names and the difference in the number of grades are so confusing that it is practically impossible to ship cotton from one of these markets to the other without creating a controversy. And it is the judgment of this committee that, so far from leading the way to Federal inspection of all these commodities, the investigation called for in this bill, both as to grain and cotton, will go far to obviate the necessity of such Federal inspection.

We believe it will be possible, in the matter of cotton, as I suggested a moment ago, to make actual sets of samples to be sent out to the different markets, so that it will be as easy a matter to grade cotton as it would be to take a ribbon to a dry-goods store and match it. It may be that a similar system may be devised even in the matter of wheat, for I notice that in Canada, where they have government inspection, they send out to the different markets actual samples of wheat at the beginning of each season, which simply mark the grade that is to be given.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, just one suggestion. I am not very familiar with the cotton market or with the merchandizing of cotton, but I have supposed that all considerable sales were upon sample, and that an expert would know what cotton might be worth by an examination of the sample; and that whether it is graded officially or otherwise, he knows as a matter of fact what its inherent qualities are and what it is worth for working up into textile fabrics.

Mr. BURLESON. If the gentleman will permit me, what he has said is largely true, but the difficulty is that in different sections the trade have different standards for the same grade of cotton. To illustrate my meaning, the standard at Atlanta for middling cotton may be entirely different from the standard used for middling cotton at Savannah, only a few miles removed. A great many of the controversies and contentions now constantly arising about the classification of cotton would be removed if we could provide a uniform standard for the different grades of cotton, and the very purpose of this amendment is to obviate the dangers alluded to which now threaten unless some such action as proposed by this amendment is taken. This will not lead to Federal inspection at all, and to no expense to the General Government. I want to say further to the gentleman from Indiana that upon the merits of this particular proposition there is no difference between the manufacturer and the grower, the consumer and producer. Even the cotton exchange element—the speculating element—agrees that this is very desirable reform as far as cotton trade generally is concerned.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the same thing applies to the grading of wheat at different places? The same quality of wheat is differently classified at Chicago and Toledo, Ohio, places not far apart.

Mr. SCOTT. Emphasizing what I have already said, and confirming what has been said by the gentleman from Texas, I wish to assure the members of this committee that in the deliberate judgment of the Committee on Agriculture the provisions for the grading of wheat and cotton, if allowed to remain in this bill, will do more than any other one thing possibly can do to satisfy those who are now insisting upon the Federal inspection of these commodities.

Mr. REID. In what way would you enforce this statute?

Mr. SCOTT. There is no provision in the bill by penal statute or otherwise to enforce it. It is simply believed that if a standard can be determined the obvious advantage of it to all parties interested in dealing in this commodity will be so great that it will be adopted by mutual consent and will pass into the commercial practice of the country by what might be called the inductive method.

Mr. REID. In other words, it will be entirely voluntary by the parties contracting?

Mr. SCOTT. Entirely so. This cotton provision has been so earnestly appealed for by both the producers and manufacturers of cotton that I am sure the results brought about by the investigation will be welcomed by both parties.

Mr. DOUGLAS. On what page of the bill is the provision?

Mr. DRISCOLL. On page 16. I want to ask the gentleman from Kansas a question. Have they not got now the same grades under the same names that you propose here?

Mr. SCOTT. They have in some markets, and in other markets they have twenty or thirty other grades.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Your names do not mean anything; they are simply abstract names. Are you going to have samples also?

Mr. BURLESON. They have the names now in use.

Mr. SCOTT. In some markets they have them. The proposition is to have actual sets of samples corresponding with the various grades named.

Mr. DRISCOLL. It strikes me that the abstract names are absolutely meaningless unless you have samples to represent those names; and if you have the samples, you must have somebody representing the Government to enforce a compliance by all the people dealing in cotton with those names, and it will lead just as sure as the world to a force of Government employees to enforce the provision.

Mr. BURLESON. The advantages will be so manifest to all parties interested that they will be glad to adopt it. There is not the least doubt about that.

Mr. DRISCOLL. While the gentleman from Texas is a believer in States rights on general principles, he is willing to get the Government to interest itself in and do things the people might otherwise do, and which the State might otherwise do, and I am inclined to think that this is only an entering wedge to get a corps of Federal employees to enforce this grading of cotton and other commodities on the people.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the gentleman is unnecessarily apprehensive in this matter. It will be a very simple thing for the Bureau employees at the beginning of each cotton season to prepare actual sets of samples and send them out to the various markets, and that is all that this paragraph proposes to do, and your committee believe all that will ever be necessary. It will not be necessary to send a Federal official along with these samples to see whether the cotton compares with them and is of a given grade or not. The samples will speak for themselves, and any man of average intelligence will be able to make the comparison.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Can not any cotton shipper produce his own samples, and can not any cotton buyer require that the bulk of the shipment shall come up to a given sample? If he has a sample that does not compare with any you name, can not he sell his cotton?

Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly. There is no suggestion in the bill of a limitation upon the right of private contract.

Mr. DRISCOLL. No man is required in selling cotton to name it, and he is not required to produce a sample that will meet any sample made by the Government. Therefore he must sell his crop by his own sample.

Mr. SCOTT. If that is true, no harm will be done, and I do not see that it argues particularly against the provision in the bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. It strikes me as another Federal interference with the rights of private individuals in the transaction of their business.

Mr. SCOTT. There is no design to interfere with anybody's private rights, and in reply to the gentleman I want to say that I think his fears are groundless, and if he will study the question closer I think he will come to that conclusion himself.

Mr. BOUTELL. I would like to make a single inquiry in the interest of barley. Some very interesting work has been carried on during the past few years in making tests of barley and improving the quality of the seed. A great part of this work has been done in cooperation with the Government by the Wahl and Henins Institute of Fermentology, in my district. This work, as I understand it, has been very valuable not only to the farmers, but to the consumers of barley. I notice there is a little change in the pharseology of this bill, and the inquiry I wish to make of the chairman in charge of the bill is whether there is anything in the bill to preclude this work being done in the future.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois was perhaps not in his seat when I began my statement, and did not hear me say that the change which had been made in the volume of the bill did not involve any change in the scope of the Department's work. I remember the particular project to which he refers, and can say that the work will be carried on in the future as it has been in the past, under the general authority of the Department.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Chairman, referring to the inspection of grain, establishing a standard, does not this paragraph on page 17 have for its intention the creation of a controversy between the boards of trade now established in this country and the buyer or seller?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, on the contrary, the intention is and the hope of your committee is that it will do away with the controversies which now are frequently arising.

Mr. McMORRAN. As I understand the situation to-day, and from reading this paragraph, especially the latter part of it—

And also for the issuance of certificates of inspection when requested by the consignor or consignee of any grain entering into foreign commerce—

I understand there is some controversy at the present time by the foreign purchaser of grain in this country as to the inspection which he shall accept. As the matter stands to-day, if he buys in the Chicago market or Minneapolis or Duluth, he is obliged to take the inspection there established. Now, under this paragraph I understand that he could appeal to the Secretary of Agriculture, who could issue a certificate of inspection for that grain purchase.

Mr. SCOTT. Replying, let me say first that the precise language to which the gentleman now calls attention has been in this bill for three years. Those certificates have been granted for the past two years whenever asked for, and the gentleman has perhaps not heard of any controversies arising from that cause. It is true, as he states, that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction in foreign markets with the grades of grain that are supplied them from the United States. That dissatisfaction has been so great that we are largely losing our market for grain in Europé. In France, for example, we sell only 20 per cent of the corn imported, when we ought to sell 80 per cent, and the bulk of that trade goes to Argentina because the grading is done more accurately, at least, if not more honestly, in that country than it is in this. It is in the hope of changing those conditions or making it possible for an American certificate of grading to be taken at par in any market of the world that we have authorized this work to be done.

Mr. McMORRAN. I would like to say that, in my judgment, with thirty or forty years' experience with boards of trade, we have in this country, that there is no country on the face of the globe where there is a more fair or better average standard of inspection than there is in this country to-day. Referring to corn, corn has created a large controversy between the foreign buyer and the shipper on this side of the water. And why? Because there are certain seasons of the year when corn heats in transit. The buyer of that corn understands the situation fully, just as much as the seller does, and when he buys that corn he takes the risk, whatever it may be. What he is seeking to do is to get some temporary advantage of the American seller, so that when that corn arrives at the point of shipment, say at our Atlantic or Gulf ports, and is in a heated condition, he may have the opportunity to reject it and go back on the inspection on which he bought it.

Mr. SCOTT. It seems to me that the observation the gentleman has made hardly applies to the provision in this bill, as I do not see how the possession of a certificate of inspection by the Federal authorities could give a foreign buyer any undue advantage over an American seller, provided the American seller has honestly graded his grain in the beginning.

There is no purpose, absolutely, in the minds of your committee in authorizing this work to be done, except to bring about, as nearly as possible, a uniformity in the grading of grain throughout the markets of the United States, believing that such uniformity would be of immense advantage not only to producers of grain, but to the purchasers and dealers in grain.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to my colleague here, and in order to facilitate the business of the House, that all of these interrogatories only prolong this debate and consume the time. These gentlemen must know that when these paragraphs are reached under the five-minute rule, all of these important questions will be discussed. I do not see how the chairman can make his statement here, as I know he is well prepared to do, if he is to be fired with all these inquiries, and I appeal to the House to have patience and wait until this statement is made, and when these paragraphs are reached we will have full discussion of all these important subjects.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The chairman has made no appeal that he should not be interrupted——

Mr. LAMB. He is too modest, perhaps, to make it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And we did not know he wished to be let alone.

Mr. LAMB. Then he is different from the rest of us. I think he is made of the same stuff that we are made of.

Mr. SCOTT. I appreciate the intercession of my friend from Virginia.

Mr. McMORRAN. I want to say to the gentleman this is one of the most important things concerning the large agricultural interests of this country, and I can not see for the life of me why the Secretary of Agriculture should attempt to create a controversy between our standard of inspection of the boards of trade, which they have agreed upon for grain, and foreign countries.

Mr. SCOTT. I am sure if the gentleman will confer with the Secretary of Agriculture he would learn it was far from his intent to create a controversy; and I would suggest, if he has not already done so, that he inform himself as to the work that has been done under this paragraph during the last two years. This is not new. There are only a dozen new words in this paragraph, the ones which relate to establishing a standard.

The work has been carried on for the last three or four years, and the fact that such troubles as the gentleman now seems to anticipate have not arisen during that time would seem to indicate they are not to be feared in the future.

Mr. McMORRAN. Do you understand the Government is to undertake an examination of this grain before shipment and before the issuance of the certificate?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not quite understand the question.

Mr. McMORRAN. In other words, take a cargo of corn from Chicago purchased by a foreign buyer. Is the Government to have inspectors stationed there to inspect that grain as well as the Chicago Board of Trade?

Mr. SCOTT. No; that is not the idea at all. The Government simply establishes laboratories at certain great grain centers and at some of the ports of the country to examine samples of grain that are brought to those laboratories, and the certificates set forth the condition of those samples. It is not the idea at all to have a force of Government inspectors at great elevators or in the railroad yards. They are stationed only in the laboratories where they grade the samples which are brought to them.

Mr. McMORRAN. Now, do you understand the Government at the present time has any laboratories that contain any machinery of any kind that will test the grain to any better advantage than our boards of trade at present have?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, as I stated a few moments ago, they have devised an apparatus for testing the water content of grain, which is so much better than anything heretofore in use that it is being rapidly adopted throughout the country.

Mr. McMORRAN. Is it not being adopted by the board of trade at Chicago?

Mr. SCOTT. Exactly; simply because it is better than anything the board of trade at Chicago has had.

Mr. McMORRAN. Has the Government anything better?

Mr. SCOTT. I say this is a device perfected by the Government, and it has been adopted by the board of trade at Chicago because it is better than what they had.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman just one question. I understood the chairman of the Agricultural Committee to state a few minutes ago that the United States sold only 20 per cent of the corn shipped to Europe.

Mr. SCOTT. To France.

Mr. MADDEN. To France—because the inspection of the grain or corn from the Argentine Republic was so much higher standard than the American inspection that the people of France accepted the Argentine Republic corn in preference to ours. Did I misunderstand him?

Mr. SCOTT. I think I made a statement substantially to that effect.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand there is no inspection whatever in the Argentine Republic on grain or meats or food products of any kind, name, or nature.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, that being true, it is an even greater reflection, I should say, upon the inspection in the United States that grain that comes from a country where there is no inspection at all sells in the market against ours.

Mr. MADDEN. In fact, they sell their grain and all food products for less money than we do, and that is the reason why they are able to get a foreign market in preference to us.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman probably knows (without wishing to protract this debate) that there has been recently held in London a congress of European buyers of grain called for the purpose of protesting against the inspection system of the United States, that the work of that congress has been called to the attention of the President, and that the Secretary of Agriculture has caused an investigation to be made to determine to what extent the complaints made by these European purchasers were correct. I would suggest that the gentleman might obtain some valuable information if he would look up the report of that congress.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask just one question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. With great pleasure.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to inquire whether the Committee on Agriculture have looked into the question of the power of Congress, under the Constitution, to fix a standard for grading grain, cotton, and so forth, and enforcing that in the country?

Mr. SCOTT. There is no proposition in this bill, Mr. Chairman, to enforce a standard. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] will doubtless remember that for a great many years the Bureau of Chemistry in the Department of Agriculture was authorized to establish standards for foods. There was no machinery of the law back of that authority to force the adoption of those standards, and yet, as a matter of fact, they were adopted throughout the country very largely by the State legislatures, which enacted laws to put them into effect. And that is what it is hoped may be accomplished in the matter of the establishment of standards for the grading of cotton and wheat; that after these standards have been established the various boards of inspection throughout the country, corporation and State, will be glad to have the standards, and by proper enactment will put them into effect in their own localities.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the matter of pure food was a matter that related to the health conditions of the country, and the matter of fixing standards for the sale of grain, cotton, and so forth, is a different proposition altogether?

Mr. SCOTT. I only attempted to draw the parallel in this respect, that there was no attempt in this appropriation bill in former years to force these standards of foods upon the country, and yet they accomplished a great deal of good because they were taken up by the various State legislatures and enacted into law.

Mr. Chairman, another rearrangement of this bill has been made in the Bureau of Plant Industry, whereby the appropriation heretofore carried as a separate item to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the continuous spread of the Mexican cotton boll weevil has been covered into the general work of the Bureau, and the appropriation has been correspondingly increased.

In 1894 the Mexican cotton boll weevil crossed the border and invaded the State of Texas. For the next few years that State combated the pest with the best means at its disposal, but with so poor success that in 1905 an appeal came to Congress for an emergency appropriation to extend the aid of the General Government. It was represented, and very truly, that the weevil was spreading so rapidly as to threaten the actual extinction of the cotton-growing industry. Indeed so great had been its ravages that in some parts of Texas large areas of cotton plantations had been wholly abandoned. In 1905, therefore, Congress made an appropriation of $250,000 to be expended in this work, carrying it on the bill as an emergency item. It has been carried in a similar way for the following three years, the amount having been reduced to $190,000 each year. The present bill, as I have just stated, omits the item as an emergency, but makes provision for the continuation of the work. This change is recommended because the work has ceased to be an emergency and has settled down into what promises to be one of the regular tasks of the Department. The boll weevil has simply been added to our other insect pests, and the fight against it is another one of our continuing problems.

When the combat first began the attack was directed along two lines. The Bureau of Entomology took up the study of the life history of the weevil with a view to ascertaining whether parasites might not be introduced which eventually might serve to keep it in check, and also in the hope of being able to suggest to planters cultural or mechanical methods of resisting its ravages. The Bureau of Plant Industry assumed as its part of the contest the problem of selecting varieties of cotton that would either in themselves be resistant to the boll weevil or mature their crops early enough to escape its worst ravages. Along both of these lines of attack decided progress has been made. The entomologists have discovered several varieties of parasites which they think eventually will multiply sufficiently to materially retard the spread of the weevil, and they have also been able to do effective work in the way of quarantining new territory against the spread of the pest.

The most practical results, however, have been reached through the operations of the Bureau of Plant Industry. This Bureau has discovered some varieties of cotton which are strongly resistant to the boll weevil, the plants having the peculiar faculty of exuding a sort of gum when the egg is laid in the boll, which seals it up and prevents it from hatching. The Bureau has also been able to find or develop new varieties of cotton whose yield is prolific and which mature much earlier than the common varieties. The Bureau has also introduced better cultural methods, so that, taking all of its improvements together, it has been able to demonstrate that in nearly every season a fairly good cotton crop can be grown in spite of the boll weevil. But the Bureau of Plant Industry has done more than this. In the areas of the very worst infection, where the growing of cotton, even with the most effective seed and the best cultural methods, is extremely doubtful, it has taught the people how to make a living without raising cotton. This has been done through what is called the "demonstration and cooperative farm method." By this method a certain number of farmers in a given county would agree with the agents of the Bureau to set apart a certain portion of their farm upon which they would agree to grow the crops which the Bureau agents might direct in exactly the method the agents would prescribe. These were called "demonstration farms."

In the county a large number of other farmers would agree to follow the directions of the Bureau agents as closely as their circumstances would permit. The demonstration farms were regularly visited by local agents of the Bureau to see that the directions were being followed, while those conducting the cooperative farms would be furnished with bulletins and such instruction as could be given by mail. This method was followed in practically all the Southern States, with the result that not less than 250,000 farmers were brought into actual contact with the agents of the Department of Agriculture, and received more or less direct instruction from them. The result in many places has been almost phenomenal. Regions where a great proportion of farms had been actually abandoned and where the people seemed hopelessly discouraged are now flourishing and in better condition than they ever were before. So successful, indeed, has the work been that it attracted the attention of the general education board at New York, which placed $70,000 during the current year at the disposal of the Bureau, to be expended in extending the work. It has met with the enthusiastic support of the people in the communities where it has been carried forward, and a great many of which have raised very considerable sums of money by private subscription to extend the work. It is doubtless along this line that the work of the future will be chiefly conducted.

I may say in passing that the success with which this demonstration and cooperative work has met in combating the boll weevil has suggested to members of your committee the idea that it might be profitably extended to other sections of the country. I think every man who has given thoughtful attention to the work of the Department of Agriculture will admit at once that if it has made a mistake in any direction it has been in its failure to get out to the people in usable form the vast store of information which has been accumulated by the experiments and research of the scientists of the Department. For many years a great corps of very able men, trained specialists, have been studying the problems of agriculture here in this Department. Undoubtedly they have made many discoveries which if put into practical effect by the farmers of the country would be of almost incalculable value. Of course many of these discoveries have been put into practical effect, and yet, undoubtedly, very many more of them have not been.

Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent in the aggregate in publishing farm bulletins, the purpose of which was to carry the results of the research of the Department to the people, but the actual effect of which in many cases has been simply to embalm and bury these results. The work in the South during the period of warfare against the boll weevil has demonstrated that the knowledge of the scientists can be carried in a most effective way to very large numbers of individual farmers at a minimum of expense. Comparatively few men are able to practically apply the information which may come to them in a bulletin, but no man is so dull as not to understand the results that are obtained on his own land from the work of his own hand. Your committee is very much disposed, therefore, to encourage the Department in this line of its effort to carry to the people the information that is acquired in its laboratories and on its experimental grounds. No new legislation is required to enable this to be done and no appropriation in this bill is made with special reference to it. The general authority given to the Secretary of Agriculture by the fundamental law of the Department is broad enough to cover this work and the ordinary appropriations are sufficient to carry it forward as rapidly as your committee believes it can be well and economically done. I have mentioned it only because as one of the later and newer methods of the Department in carrying forward its general work it seems to me to be of peculiar interest.

Several new limitations have been inserted in the paragraphs making appropriation for the Bureau of Forestry, all of them fully warranted, your committee believes, by the need of the service and calculated to promote its efficiency. One of the most important of these is a provision directing the Secretary to divide and designate national forests in such manner as he may deem best for administrative purposes. In the absence of such a provision the Secretary is obliged to administer these forests in the shape in which they were originally created, by proclamation of the President. It often happens, of course, that the same forest will occupy sections of two different States, or one part of a forest may be remote from another part, separated by a range of mountains difficult at all times and sometimes impossible to cross. It seemed to your committee to be obviously in the interest of economy and efficiency that the Secretary should be allowed to divide the forests for the purpose named.

Another limitation directs that hereafter permits for power plants within national forests may be made irrevocable, except for breach of condition, for a term not exceeding fifty years. At present any permit of this character is revocable at the will of the Secretary of Agriculture. Your committee believes there is a good deal of justice in the complaint that large investments of capital will not be made and can not safely be made upon so uncertain a tenure as the will of an administrative officer. Therefore the change suggested has been recommended. There are several other changes recommended in this paragraph, but they are of minor importance and can be sufficiently discussed when we come to consider the bill under the five-minute rule.

I do not wish to dismiss the Bureau of Forestry, however, without at least a few words of comment upon the splendid work this Bureau is doing and upon the broad, beneficent, and statesmanlike policy that it is so effectively carrying forward.

That our timber supply was rapidly disappearing and that something must be done if what remained of the forested area of our public domain was not soon to pass for a song into private hands, was first recognized by Congress in 1891, when an act was passed authorizing the President to set apart forest reserves, or "national forests," as they are now called. The first forests were created by President Harrison, and his example has been followed by his successors, until now the total area within our national forests has reached the imposing aggregate of 164,000,000 acres, an area equal to all of the States of the Union east of the Ohio River and north of North Carolina, equal in extent to the whole German Empire, with Switzerland, the Netherlands, and Denmark thrown in; a princely domain, indeed. And yet there is no thoughtful and informed American citizen who does not regret that the policy could not have been inaugurated a hundred years before it was and the protecting arm of the Federal Government thrown about the once splendid hard-wood forests of our Eastern mountains as it has been about what remains of the stately spruce and pine that clothe the slopes of the Rockies.

Very naturally, but very unfortunately, in the beginning, and for fourteen years afterwards, these forests were put under the charge of the General Land Office. I say very unfortunately, because that office was organized to sell the public domain and not to use it. The mistake was corrected in 1905, when an act was passed transferring these forests to the Department of Agriculture. The wisdom of that transfer was made immediately apparent by the figures on our national balance sheet. During 1905, the last year the forests were administered by the Land Office, the total receipts from the sale of timber, grazing privileges, etc., amounted to $73,276.15. In the very next year, the first year they were administered by the Department of Agriculture, the receipts from the same purposes jumped to the sum of $767,219.96. That was in 1906. During the fiscal year of 1907, the total receipts from the forests were $1,571,059.44; and it is estimated that the receipts this year will not fall below $2,000,000.

Mr. BONYNGE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BONYNGE. Is it to be the policy of the Forestry Bureau to make the national forests revenue-producing?

Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BONYNGE. And it is the policy of the Bureau that the forests are maintained for the purpose of making revenue by the National Government out of the development of the resources of the forests?

Mr. SCOTT. They are not maintained for the purpose of making revenue, but the revenue comes incidentally, and ought not, it seems to the committee, to be refused and turned aside.

Mr. BONYNGE. Will the gentleman state to what extent the Government has now gone into the lumber business and how much timber was sold during the past year by the National Government?

Mr. SCOTT. I just stated that the total receipts during the fiscal year, 1907, were $1,571,059.44.

Mr. BONYNGE. How much was derived from the sale of timber?

Mr. SCOTT. I take from the "Hearings," page 289, the following:

Summary of receipts from the national forests in the United States for the fiscal year July 1, 1906, to June 30, 1907.

Timber sales	$602,565.42
Timber settlements	17,811.25
Timber trespass	66,436.45
Grazing	863,920.32
Special uses	20,326.00
Total	1,571,059.44

Mr. DRISCOLL. This bill carries an appropriation for the forest service nearly $1,400,000 larger than the last year's appropriation, does it not?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is that $1,400,000 received from the forest reserve in one way or another a part of this, or is that expended in addition to this large appropriation?

Mr. SCOTT. When the forests were transferred from the General Land Office in 1905 to the Department of Agriculture that act contained a proviso that all the revenue received from the forests should go into a revolving fund, to be expended by the Forestry Bureau without direct appropriation by Congress. The last session of the last Congress, however, changed that law, and provided that the money received from the use of the forests should be covered as a miscellaneous receipt into the Treasury, to be appropriated out in the way that any other money in the Treasury is appropriated.

But before that law took effect there had accumulated in this revolving fund provided for under the former act $1,020,000 that was available for the use of the Bureau during the current fiscal year. No money will be available from such source during the coming fiscal year, consequently we are obliged in this bill to appropriate a sufficient amount to make up for the difference.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And that accounts for the large appropriation?

Mr. SCOTT. That accounts for the large appropriation. I may say that during the current year the appropriation for salaries and expenses was $1,900,000; but in addition to that the Bureau had the use of $1,020,000 left over from the revolving fund, making the total available for this year $2,920,000. There is allowed in this bill for that same purpose $3,296,200, an apparent increase of $376,200; but as a matter of fact, if the old system had continued and we could use this year all the revenues of the forests, the appropriation carried in the present bill for this Bureau, instead of showing an increase over last year, would show an actual decrease of $604,300.

It is true, as the gentleman from Colorado has suggested, that there has been a great deal of opposition to the forest policy, and it is very natural that there should be such opposition. Men quickly and naturally and easily come to consider a privilege, in the exercise of which they have not been disturbed, as a vested right. And so the men who had been grazing their flocks and herds upon the thousand hills of the public domain, without money and without price, complained bitterly at first when they were asked to pay a fee for the privilege. The men who had been going into the public forests, not only with ax and saw, but with ax and sawmill, and taking what they wanted for the cost of the taking, felt as if their constitutional rights were being invaded when they were told that the trees they cut would be scaled and a price would be charged for the lumber they yielded. It is natural, I say, that in the beginning there should have been opposition to this policy.

But fortunately that opposition has for the most part disappeared. In the first place the proposition which met the opponents, namely, that the property of all of the people ought not to be monopolized by a few of the people, sounded rather too much like an axiom to be seriously disputed. In the second place it was quickly demonstrated that even the interests of those who had been using the forests free of charge were enhanced by the regulations which followed the imposition of the charge. The wars between the cattle men and the sheep men, which for years had taken their annual toll of human life, became a thing of the past, and peace came to the ranges. The ranges themselves, relieved of overgrazing, rapidly regained their old luxuriance, so that the stock fed upon them comes through the season now in so much better condition than formerly that the difference practically offsets the moderate fee that is charged. If I cared to take the time of the committee, therefore, I could quote whole pages of resolutions and other evidences of public sentiment, to show that those who most bitterly opposed the policy in the beginning are now among its firmest friends.

The Bureau of Chemistry, which comes next in order in this bill, was brought into a position of the very first importance by the passage of the food and drug act. It is probably safe to say that no legislation of recent years has been so far-reaching, so radical in its character, and, I may add, so salutary in its effect as the statute commonly known as the "pure-food law." It was international in its scope, for it barred from our markets all food and drugs, no matter from what country they came, which did not meet the requirements the law laid down. It was revolutionary in its character, because it entered a field which has heretofore not been touched by Federal legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to conclude my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. This legislation, as I was saying, is not only international in its scope, but it is revolutionary in its character. For the first time in our history the Government of the United States has laid its hands on the manufacturers of foods and drugs and has said to them, "You shall not adulterate or misbrand of short weight your goods." It has been in effect a reenactment by the Congress of the United States of the primal commandment, "Thou shalt not steal, or lie, or cheat." The enforcement of such an act necessarily imposed upon the Bureau responsible for it an enormous amount of work and a heavy responsibility. First of all, the men were to be found—specialists in foods, specialists in drugs, trained chemists, trained microscopists, trained business men; then laboratories were to be established and equipped at all the ports of entry and in all the great commercial centers. All this was preliminary, the mere getting ready. And then followed the ceaseless vigilance which stood guard at every seaport to see that the foreigner did not evade the law and which inspected every domestic market to make sure that our own people obeyed it. And all the time the law was to be interpreted—day by day a score or a hundred cases coming up to demand a ruling—to determine whether they fell within the law or outside of it.

It was a colossal task that was suddenly imposed upon this Bureau, and that it has been so well performed stands vastly to the credit of the great Secretary, whose strength seems equal to any draft made upon it, and to the able and tireless Chief of the Bureau, Dr. H. W. Wiley. It has not been enforced without some friction—that goes with the saying. Hundreds of cases of adulterated goods have been seized, hundreds of foreign invoices have been ordered reshipped, and innumerable bitter protests have been made against the rulings of the Department, particularly touching the use of preservatives and the correctness of labels. But in view of the vast sweep of the new law and its radical and revolutionary character it is a remarkable and, to my mind, a most gratifying fact that thus far it has been found necessary to institute criminal prosecutions in but seventeen cases. There is but one inference to be drawn from this fact, and that is that the great body of men engaged in the preparation and manufacture of foods and drugs are honest men who sincerely desire to obey the law. Indeed, it is only through the cordial support and cooperation of these honest men that anything like an effectual enforcement of a law of this character is at all possible.

I said there had been many protests against the rulings of the Department touching certain matters. Most of these have been amicably adjusted. In some cases, however, the interests involved are so great and the differences of opinion so fundamental that an appeal has been taken to the courts. In order to avoid this necessity so far as possible in the future, the Secretary has recently appointed a special board of referees consisting of Dr. Ira Remsen, president of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md., chairman; Prof. Russell H. Chittenden, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.; Dr. C. A. Herter, College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York; Dr. Alonzo E. Taylor, University of California, Berkeley, Cal., and Prof. John H. Long, Northwestern University, Chicago, Ill.; a very distinguished board, indeed, to which will be referred in the future questions calling for purely technical and scientific determination upon which the rulings of the Department have been excepted to by the parties in interest.

On the whole, therefore, I am glad to be able to report that the enforcement of this law is proceeding smoothly and effectively, and as the meaning of the law becomes settled, as the manufacturers and the Department come together on definitions, the situation will steadily improve until, like the great body of our laws, it will be enforced and obeyed as a matter of course.

It will be, perhaps, a matter of disappointment to some Members of the House to know that there is no apparent increase in the Bureau of Soils.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Before the gentleman leaves the Bureau of Chemistry, will he allow me a question?

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I notice the report says that there is an increase of $75,000 allowed for the general expenses of the Bureau. Can the gentleman tell us what the nature of the expense or the increase is, and is it in the employment of additional officials?

Mr. SCOTT. Most of that increase was allowed in order to more effectively enforce the pure-food law. There are now vast sections of the country in which there are practically no agents of the Department, and the Secretary desires very much to cover those sections of the country, so as to get a more effective enforcement of the law.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Did the committee grant as much as the Secretary asked?

Mr. SCOTT. No; the Secretary asked for an increase of $100,000, and the committee allowed an increase of $75,000, about $50,000 of which it is expected by the committee will be used in extending the pure-food inspection and $25,000 in carrying forward other work of the Bureau.

Mr. LAWRENCE. In view of the importance of the work, I think the increase is very reasonable.

Mr. SCOTT. I am glad to hear the gentleman express that opinion.

I was saying that there might be disappointment on the part of many Members of the House when it was noted that there has been no apparent increase in the appropriation for the Bureau of Soils. I hope, however, that when the Members understand the real situation in regard to that Bureau and its relation to the other bureaus of the Department, they will approve of the action of your committee.

It is no doubt true, as the Chief of this Bureau has said in his annual report, that there is a widespread demand for soil surveys. But it is the belief of your committee that this demand comes for the most part from those who misapprehend the real meaning of a soil survey and who would be disappointed if their requests were granted. In briefest possible terms, a soil survey is such a study of a given area as will determine the type or types of soils comprised within it. As a result of this study, a map is made showing the extent and location of the various soils, and a report is printed describing the peculiar characteristics of the different soil types, and suggesting the crops especially adapted to each one. I have always been of the opinion, if I may be pardoned a personal reference, that the average farmer could not make head nor tail of one of these soil survey maps, or get any practical, usable information out of the report that accompanied it. But I have never been able to get anybody to agree with me in that opinion—until this year.

This year the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], appearing before the Committee on Agriculture to present a petition numerously signed by Members of the House for a large increase in the appropriation for this Bureau, gave it as his opinion that a soil survey was absolutely without value unless it could be followed up by experts to tell the people what it meant. There were several representatives of the Bureau present when that statement was made, and neither then nor subsequently did they dissent from it. On the contrary, when specifically asked if they concurred in the opinion expressed by Mr. UNDERWOOD, they replied substantially in the affirmative. Indeed, they went further, and gave it as their opinion that even the trained, skilled, scientific agronomists in the other bureaus of the Department could not properly interpret one of these soil-survey maps; that it could only be done by a soil specialist. I do not cite this change of view on the part of the men engaged in this Bureau in any critical or unkind spirit. They were doubtless sincere in believing in former years that the people could understand their work, and they are no doubt sincere now in believing they can not.

Only it seems rather too bad that for nine years we have been making expensive surveys and publishing expensive maps, only to discover now that they can not be understood by the people they are intended to benefit.

But now that we have made this discovery, what are we going to do about it? The Chief of the Bureau of Soils has himself answered that question by organizing a division of soil management, the work of which is described in the following language:

> This work has for its object the investigation of cultural methods required to put the soil into good condition for crops, the crop rotation suited to different soils to maintain them in their highest degree of fertility, and the fertilizer requirements of soils by greenhouse and field methods as an aid in maintaining the fertility of the soil; the effect of different fertilizer constituents and their varying proportions in combinations upon different soils and different crops. This work involves a study of the field, of the best systems of soil management, and of crop adaptation in some of the important agricultural districts of the country, with a view to obtaining from the experience of farmers themselves a better understanding of the best methods of soil management. The object is to disseminate the information so gathered among the people.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman state from what he read?

Mr. SCOTT. I was reading from one of the project sheets of the Bureau of Soils.

Now, that is an eminently sensible proposal, and it is too bad the Bureau of Soils could not have realized many years ago the importance and value of it. But the trouble with it now is that it exactly duplicates work that is already being done, very successfully done, by another bureau of the Department. Several years ago the Bureau of Plant Industry organized what is known as the Division of Farm Management, and that division has been most energetically and effectively "studying in the field the best systems of soil management and of crop adaptation, with a view to obtaining from the experience of farmers themselves a better understanding of the best method of soil management." Exactly the work, you see, which the Bureau of Soils now proposes to do.

Your committee does not believe, and I think the House will not believe, that there should be built up in two bureaus of the same Department two great, expensive divisions to cover almost identically the same ground. We believe the work ought to be done, but we believe it ought to be done in the bureau where it is already successfully under way, and which seems to be peculiarly qualified to do it. Your committee, therefore, has declined to recommend the largely increased appropriation which was asked for by the Bureau of Soils for this work. The appropriation we have recommended, while apparently the same as for the current year, as a matter of fact is $38,000 larger, because that amount will be expended this year for work the continuation of which the committee has declined to authorize, and we believe that the funds carried in this bill will be ample to enable the Bureau to carry forward all the work in its legitimate field which can be profitably done.

Mr. PERKINS. As I understood the gentleman's statement, it is his opinion that on the whole the work done in these soil surveys has not been wholly satisfactory or very valuable.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; that is my opinion.

Mr. PERKINS. I intended to ask whether that was the gentleman's opinion a little further back. Now, I understand it is, because I had occasion a year or two ago to submit to a very intelligent body of men having to do with crops and agriculture in a large way a proposition in which I stated I could obtain a soil survey in certain portions of my State, which I supposed they would welcome gladly. I was surprised, however, to have them write me that they did not regard it as of special value, and did not care to have the soil surveyed in the counties I had indicated. They seemed to have reached the same conclusion which the gentleman in charge of the bill has, that the soil surveys are not of very much practical value.

Mr. SCOTT. I think they are of almost no practical value, as I have said, unless followed by experts who can tell what they mean. I do believe, however, that some of the work of the soil survey has been made valuable after being followed up in the way I have stated.

Mr. DWIGHT. Does this appropriation bill carry money enough to follow up the line of work?

Mr. SCOTT. It does.

Mr. DWIGHT. It is $170,000——

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to say at this point that the action of the committee in respect to this Bureau met with the entire approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, and there is an understanding with him that the demonstration work which the Bureau of Soils has started shall be carried forward through the division in which it properly belongs, so the work will not stop.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I just want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is left then for that Bureau of Soils to do? If you will permit me, I want to testify to the extreme value of the work that has been done along that line by the Bureau of Plant Industry. I do not think it can be overstated, because my business and my home are in the neighborhood where that is appreciated highly. I would like to know, as a matter of administration, what is left for the Bureau of Soils distinctively to do?

Mr. SCOTT. The Bureau of Soils is left to do all the work which in the past it has legitimately done. It came before the committee this year asking for the insertion of new language in this bill to allow it to go ahead and do the demonstration work to which I have referred, but the committee thought that the work ought to be done by the Bureau where it is already organized and under way, and therefore refused to admit new language. But it did not change the old language, so that all the work which the Bureau has been able to do legitimately in the past years it can still continue to do.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have never been able to find out what that was.

Mr. SCOTT. I could explain to the gentleman, but it would take a long time and I am sure he will not ask me to do it at this stage of the discussion.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I think it would be interesting if the gentleman will state more fully just what he means by carrying out this work of the Bureau of Soils beyond the survey and map and the report that goes with the map.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, as briefly as I can I will use as an illustration a survey that was made in Florida, where an area was found, which, according to the judgment of the Bureau of Soils, was admirably adapted to growing tobacco. It had been used heretofore for other crops, and in order to demonstrate that it was suitable for tobacco they have planted tobacco upon it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The Government or the men?

Mr. SCOTT. The Bureau of Soils had tobacco planted there under the direction of its own employees. It is now going forward to grow tobacco in order to demonstrate that the soil is adapted to the purpose for which its survey declared it to be.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Of course it is not possible for the Bureau of Soils to have enough money to do that with all surveys or maps, because that would require experiment stations all through the country to do that class of work.

Mr. SCOTT. I may say to the members of the committee, who do me the honor to remain here and seem to be interested in this discussion, that it is the judgment of the committee, which I think is shared now by the Secretary, that the Bureau of Soils should devote itself hereafter to what might be called a "regional" survey of the country. Up to this time these surveys have been made here and there and everywhere, yielding practically to the greatest pressure upon the Chief of the Bureau. They have been made in accordance with no fixed plan or after any settled system.

I believe it would be a good idea if they should take, for instance, the Appalachian Mountains system and survey it from north to south, making a systematic survey, determining, if they are able to do it, what fruits or crops are best adapted to the various soils located in that region. I believe it would be a good idea for them to take the semiarid strip of country from Canada down this side of the mountains as far as Texas, and make a regional survey of that section. That is the class of work which we hope to see the Bureau doing in the future.

In the Bureau of Entomology the only important change suggested has been the elimination of the language under which, in former years, work had been done in the hope of developing the silk industry. We have been trying for a long time to grow silk in this country. As far back as 1622 King James the First offered premiums for the breeding of silk worms in Virginia. A little over a century later a parcel of Government ground in Georgia was allotted for growing mulberry trees in aid of silk culture. In 1748 Parliament put a premium on silk culture in the colonies, and in 1766 the South Carolina assembly voted a thousand pounds for the establishment of a silk filature in Charleston. Benjamin Franklin, while acting as the agent of Pennsylvania in England, sent home silkworm eggs and mulberry cuttings to start silk growing. At different times in different places and in many different ways during the next hundred years the effort was made to introduce the industry into this country. Along in the early eighties Congress started in vigorously upon the subject, making an appropriation of $15,000 to promote silk culture. This was raised a year or two later to $30,000. Later it was dropped to $10,000, and for the past few years a sum ranging between that and $5,000 has been annually expended by the Department for that purpose. But out of all these efforts and experiments nothing practical has come. The Department estimates that throughout the entire country during the past year less than $1,000 worth of cocoons were produced. It does not seem to your committee worth while to continue to spend from $5,000 to $10,000 a year to promote an industry which, after nearly three hundred years of effort, has not been able to reach an annual product in excess of $1,000. The committee recommends, therefore, that the authority for further expenditure be withdrawn. When the time comes in the United States, and Heaven send it may never come, when a large proportion of our population are forced to work for a daily wage of 25 cents, the silk industry can doubtless be established, but not before then.

Mr. BURGESS. Will the gentleman permit me a minute? I am very much interested in what he has said about this soil-survey matter. Before he gets away from that I would like to see if I understand correctly what the situation is now. There is no change in this bill in that Bureau?

Mr. SCOTT. Absolutely the language of the bill remains——

Mr. BURGESS. Does it carry an appropriation for the continuance of their work as heretofore done?

Mr. SCOTT. They will have, as I stated a few moments ago, as a matter of fact, $38,000 more for their legitimate work than they have this year, for the reason that they are spending $38,000 this year for this demonstration work which next year will be done in another bureau.

Mr. BURGESS. And the provision is to carry out the dissemination of this matter that they gather, in these maps, and so forth?

Mr. DRISCOLL. As a matter of fact, most of the experimental work now is in reference to tobacco. I mean where they practically try out these soils.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; they are doing more work in tobacco than in anything else.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is there anything in this appropriation to continue the experimental work?

Mr. SCOTT. The work in tobacco, with the exception of perhaps one or two small areas, has already been turned over to the Bureau of Plant Industry, and it will be carried forward as in former years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I understand the chairman to say that the work they have to do with the $38,000 next year would be confined to legitimate business of the Bureau. Unfortunately for me, I was not present when the gentleman explained this particular feature of the bill. Do I understand by that that there will be no further appropriation for the utilization work of this Bureau?

Mr. SCOTT. I have already stated—and I will be glad if the gentleman would do me the honor to look up my remarks in the RECORD to-morrow, where he will see it explained fully—I have already stated that the demonstration work, the utilization work, which the Bureau of Soils has started in various sections of the country will be carried forward by the Bureau of Plant Industry.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, will the chairman tell us under what section of this bill the Bureau of Plant Industry has any authority to do this work?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, it has already been doing the work for many years, and its authority is not questioned. You will find the language fully authorizes this Bureau to carry information to the people by means of demonstration work, as well as in other ways.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not want to be understood as questioning the authority. I was simply asking for the information. I am very anxious that the work go forward, and it is immaterial to me which bureau carries it forward.

Mr. SCOTT. I share the gentleman's interest in having this work go forward, and I wish to assure him the committee had it clearly understood that this should be done before making any change in this bill.

It will be remembered that the last agricultural appropriation bill contained a paragraph directing the Secretary to report to this Congress whether or not the Bureau of Biology was doing work which is duplicated by the Government and which is of real economic value. That report has been made and is available for all who wish to consult it. In the opinion of your committee it demonstrates clearly that the work of the Bureau is not a duplication of any being done elsewhere and that it is of direct and very great value to agriculture. For one thing, this Bureau is charged with the enforcement of the law prohibiting the introduction into the United States of diseased or injurious birds and mammals—a very important function. It is also responsible for enforcing the Lacey Act for the protection of game.

But in addition to these administrative functions, the work which the Bureau has done in acquiring and publishing information as to the birds and mammals which are beneficial and those which are injurious, the influence it has exerted in protecting the beneficial varieties, and the methods it has devised for exterminating those which are injurious, is undoubtedly of very great practical value. Your committee has therefore not only given the Bureau a place in the bill, but has recommended a moderate increase in its appropriation.

The work of the Division of Accounts and Disbursements, of the Division of Publications, of the Bureau of Statistics, and the library necessarily is of the same character from year to year, and calls for no special comment, except to remark that the moderate increases recommended in their respective appropriations are only such as in the judgment of your committee were warranted by the general growth of the Department.

Under the head of contingent expenses we have included an item of $25,000 for the purpose of installing a power plant at the new Agricultural Department building. This estimate comes to us in the way prescribed by law, by the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, and upon the assurance of the Secretary of the Treasury that the power which it is sought to create can not be obtained as cheaply from any other source; and I hope the item will be permitted to remain in the bill.

Under the Office of Experiment Stations your committee has directed that not to exceed $5,000 be expended to establish and maintain an experiment station on the Island of Guam. This tiny and remote island came into our hands, as everybody knows, by virtue of the treaty with Spain. It is said to be extremely fertile, and the native population, about 9,000 souls, is reputed to be peace loving, intelligent, and industrious. Certain it is that the people have never given us any trouble, and perhaps for that reason we have neglected them.

One of the Commissioners from the Philippines, who was quartered there for two years as a prisoner of war, tells me that the only agricultural implements they have are the rude hoes which they have fashioned from the gun barrels left there by the Spaniards. They have not exactly beaten their spears into pruning hooks and their swords into plowshares, but they have come as near to it as their raw material would admit. Before the American occupation the chief food supply of the island came from the cocoanut trees; but by our carelessness some diseased trees were introduced, and the disease is spreading to the native groves with a rapidity that threatens their total destruction. It is certainly "up to us" to try to do something to at least offset the calamity we have brought upon the people of this lonely and far-away island, and the $5,000 carried in this bill for their benefit will at least make a beginning.

A year ago it was decided to discontinue the nutrition work that was being done in Connecticut at the expense of the Department, and an appropriation of $5,000 was made to defray the expense of closing up the laboratory there and bringing the machinery it contained to Washington. Only $2,000 of that amount was expended for this purpose, and the present bill recommends that the remaining $3,000 be expended in setting up the apparatus and preparing for publication the results already obtained.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. GRAFF. I have taken some interest in looking up the progress of the investigation of the Department of Agriculture as to new material for the manufacture of paper. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state how far that investigation has progressed and whether there has been any material result or promise of result?

Mr. SCOTT. I will state to my friend from Illinois that this bill, for the first time, carries authority to make the investigations to which he refers. They have not been undertaken—at least not in any systematic way—up to this time.

Mr. GRAFF. I understood they had made some investigation, but not to any large extent.

Mr. SCOTT. Nothing upon which any report has been made. It is a matter of common knowledge that our supply of spruce and fir trees, from which practically all the print paper now in use in this country is made, is rapidly becoming exhausted. It is hard to imagine any single agricultural discovery which would begin to equal in importance to the whole country the discovery of a plant from which paper could be cheaply and easily made. Your committee felt fully warranted, therefore, in placing $10,000 at the disposal of the Secretary in order that the search might begin.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi with pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Toward what material do the investigations seem to point?

Mr. SCOTT. As I said to the gentleman from Illinois, the investigations have not proceeded far enough for them to have made a report. They expect to study various fibers—flax fiber, cornstalk fiber, and perhaps some grasses from the Philippines—but the work has not yet really begun.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked the gentleman the question because, having the utmost confidence in the soundness of his judgment, I wanted to know if he thought it would be easier to get cheap paper that way, to wit, by expending the money of the Government in experiments in some new paper material rather than simply to put wood pulp and print paper on the free list now.

Mr. SCOTT. I am sure my distinguished friend the Senator from Mississippi [laughter]——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not Senator yet.

Mr. SCOTT. Does not expect me to enter into a tariff debate at this time. I might say, in just a few words, that if he could convince me that the tariff on wood pulp and paper, which has remained the same for the past ten years, is wholly responsible for the great advance in the price of paper that has taken place during that time, I perhaps would be willing——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Supposing I could convince you that it is partially responsible, would not that have the same effect?

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman could convince me to that effect I would be greatly interested in discussing that question when it is properly before the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Until that, then, your idea is to make the consumers of paper, virtually all the people, pay the American cost of paper, the duty added, and then spend more money of the Government, contributed by the people, in trying to find out something else out of which paper can be made?

Mr. SCOTT. Until then and after then I am of the opinion that if we could by the expenditure of $10,000 a year for a few years find some material besides the trees which grow in our forests out of which paper could be made the expenditure would be amply justified.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state that I had another reason for asking the gentleman these questions. I am very much interested in some recent literature upon the subject of making paper out of cotton stalks. I think you can not make paper out of cotton stalks as well or as cheaply as out of the things you now make it of, and still I thought perhaps it was an insidious effort of the Republican party to bribe the cotton raisers by the hope of an opportunity of developing a new industry. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman is no doubt fully warranted in that suspicion. [Laughter.]

I desire now, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the committee to the two emergency appropriations carried in this bill.

Two years ago, in response to a most urgent appeal, the Congress authorized an appropriation of $82,500 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into cooperation with the different States for the purpose of preventing the further spread of the gypsy and brown-tail moths, which were ravaging the groves and forests of the New England States. The work was undertaken and the results were so encouraging that Congress last year increased the appropriation to $150,000. This year, upon the earnest appeal of the representatives on this floor from the States concerned, your committee has recommended that the appropriation be increased to $250,000. This is a very large sum of money; but the emergency is very great. Those best qualified to know assure us that practically the whole forest area of all the New England States is threatened, and the loss, if the ravages of these pests can not be prevented, will be incalculable.

The local appreciation of the gravity of the danger is shown by the fact that the State of Massachusetts alone expended more than a million dollars by legislative appropriation before coming to the General Government for aid, while other States have also expended generous sums. Your committee felt, therefore, that any reasonable appropriation would be but a bagatelle if it should result in preventing the further spread of these devastating pests. The work has been done under direction of the Bureau of Entomology, and has followed two general lines, one the introduction of parasites and one the actual physical destruction of the insects. In certain parts of Europe where the gypsy moth has always existed it has been kept in check by certain parasites. During the past two years forty varieties of these parasites have been brought over here, and the entomologists are certain that some of them at least have become acclimated and will give a good account of themselves. It is through the activity of these natural enemies that the ultimate control of the moth must be obtained.

In the meantime it is highly important that they should be prevented as far as possible from spreading, and it is in that work that the greater part of the money heretofore appropriated has been expended. The results, as reported to your committee, have been very encouraging indeed. Those engaged in the work, however, and those who have observed it are of the opinion that a large sum spent within the next year or two will bring vastly better results than the same sum extended over a longer period, and the amount carried in the bill is therefore recommended.

The second emergency appropriation carried in the bill is that for the eradication of what is commonly known as the Texas cattle tick, the parasite which transmits the Texas fever. This item first appeared in the bill two years ago, the same time as that for the extermination of the gypsy moth, and for the same amount, $82,500. The amount was increased last year, as the gypsy moth appropriation was, to $150,000, and in this bill both of them are again brought to the same amount.

But while the two appropriations from the beginning have been twins, the problems they represent are very different. The gypsy moth is a foreigner, but recently introduced and spreading with alarming rapidity. The cattle tick is a native and has been long a subject of quarantine. One represents what might be called an acute attack, while the other is a chronic case. The Texas tick is responsible for the quarantine line which for nearly twenty years has stretched across our country from one ocean to the other. The annual cost of maintaining this line to the different States and to the nation can hardly be less than half a million dollars. But that is the smallest item of the loss inflicted upon the country by the cattle tick. The presence of the tick depreciates the price of every head of cattle below the quarantine line, while it deprives the Northern States of the market they would otherwise find in the South for their high-grade stock. The loss to the North can not be even guessed at, but careful men have assured us that the annual loss suffered by the States south of the line can not be less than $40,000,000.

If this estimate is even approximately correct, it needs no argument to justify a most liberal appropriation from the Federal Treasury to combat the pest that inflicts such stupendous loss, provided it can be done with any hope of success. Two years ago the committee hesitated to authorize the attempt, because at first blush it seemed a hopeless task to attack an insect infesting a vast region where the climatic and other conditions were perfectly suited to its enormously rapid reproduction. The experience of the past two years, however, has been highly encouraging. During that time different areas, aggregating 60,000 square miles, have been freed from the ticks and the quarantine line moved that much farther southward. It will take a long while, of course—perhaps fifteen or twenty years—to complete the work. But there seems no doubt that if persisted in it can be done, and even if it takes twice the estimated time it will be well worth doing. Let the quarantine line be forced down to the Mexican border, where it belongs, so that cattle can be freely shipped northward or southward from every State in the Union, and the advantage to the whole country will be simply incalculable.

I believe I have now touched upon all the features of this bill that seem to call for extended comment. When we come to consider the bill under the five-minute rule, I or other members of the committee will be glad, of course, to discuss any of its details concerning which explanation may be desired.

It would afford me a great deal of pleasure, Mr. Chairman, in presenting this bill to describe at length the intensely interesting and very valuable work that is being done by each one of the great bureaus of this great Department, but I do not wish to weary the patience of the House. Very briefly let me say, in closing, that of all the great Departments of our Government none has had a beginning so modest and inconspicuous as that of the Department of Agriculture, and, with the possible exception of the Post-Office, not one now comes into such close and intimate and helpful contact with so great a proportion of our people.

The first direct appropriation by act of Congress for the benefit of agriculture in the United States was that of March 3, 1839, directing that the sum of $1,000 be expended by the Commissioner of Patents "in the collection of agricultural statistics, and for other agricultural purposes." I was a little curious to know just how the Commissioner expended that vast sum of money, so I hunted up his report for the following year, and this is what I found:

> The small appropriation made in 1839 for statistics and other agricultural purposes has limited the expenses of the Commissioner to the sum granted. Upward of 30,000 packages of seeds have been distributed during the last year, and from the gratification expressed by those who have received them the most favorable anticipations are indulged that the effort thus made has met the cordial and thankful acknowledgments of the agricultural community. When the seeds collected in the remote parts of the globe, together with those more easily procured, shall arrive and be distributed, still further gratification and benefit may be expected.

From which it will be seen that those of our colleagues who have so valiantly championed the free-seed distribution have been defending an ancient, if not an honorable, precedent.

Whatever the good results may have been from the expenditure of this initial $1,000, Congress did not see fit to continue it, and it was not until 1842 that another $1,000 was appropriated. The language of the act remained the same, "For the collection of agricultural statistics and for other agricultural purposes." And this is the language in which all the subsequent appropriations were made up to 1852. By that time the appropriation had climbed to $5,000, and the language was changed to read: "For the collection of agricultural statistics and for the purchase of seeds." Clearly the point had been reached at which the Congress did not want to take the chances of the Commissioner of Patents placing the wrong interpretation upon that phrase, "other agricultural purposes." The language was not again materially changed until 1856, when $30,000 was appropriated "For the collection of agricultural statistics, investigations for promoting agriculture and rural economy, and the procurement and distribution of cuttings and seeds."

In 1861 the wording of the act was broadened to provide for the "propagation" as well as the procurement and distribution of seeds, and in 1862 provision was made for the introduction and protection of insectivorous birds and for investigations to test the practicability of preparing flax and hemp as a substitute for cotton—this last to be considered, I presume, as a sort of war measure.

By this time an Agricultural Division had been organized in the Department of the Interior, consisting of 9 persons, under the immediate direction of the Commissioner of Patents, through whom all the appropriations thus far made for agricultural purposes were to be expended. It was this division which, by act of Congress approved May 15, 1862, was withdrawn from the Interior and organized as a separate bureau, the chief of which was designated as the Commissioner of Agriculture. Slowly still, but steadily, this division grew, receiving every year a larger appropriation and broadening every year the scope of its work until, in 1889, when its appropriation had reached the sum of $1,134,480, and the number of its employees had grown to 488, it was considered worthy to be dignified as a full-fledged Executive Department of the Government with a Cabinet minister at its head.

That was but nineteen years ago, and yet in that time what a place this Department has made for itself in the economic and industrial life of this nation! I said a moment ago that with the possible exception of the Post-Office no other Department of our Government comes into such intimate contact with so great a proportion of our people. And is that not literally true?

Every morning millions of American citizens, opening their daily papers, glance first of all at the forecast of the day's weather, sent out by the Department of Agriculture, and govern their day's plans very largely by what they see there. Every day during the growing season 2,000,000 American farmers receive by telephone the weather report, which shapes in large degree the conduct of their farming operations. At every seaport and at every harbor of our Great Lakes the employees and observers of this Bureau stand guard, and the warnings that they give to the men who go down to the sea in ships have saved hundreds of lives every year and millions of dollars' worth of property.

And as the Weather Bureau stands guard over the lives and property of the people, so the other bureaus of this great Department keep watch over their health and the health of their domestic animals. For many years the Bureau of Animal Industry has been waging war upon the diseases that ravage the flocks and herds of our Western ranges, and now it has set itself to lift the embargo from the Southern pastures. During the fiscal year 1907 nearly 6,000,000,000 pounds of American food products passed into the markets of the world unchallenged, because they bore the approving stamp of the Department of Agriculture, while 33,000,000 pounds of similar products were destroyed without protest, because that Department declared they were unfit for human food.

Similar but even more far-reaching authority is exercised by the Bureau of Chemistry, for its agents stand in every market place with almost despotic power of approval or condemnation over the foods and drugs that are offered for sale therein. You would seek long through the statute books of the nation before you would find more broad or more searching police powers than are vested in these two bureaus of the Department of Agriculture.

And so if time served I could take up all the bureaus of this great Department, one after the other, and show how they are extending their ceaseless activities in a thousand helpful ways, "promoting the interests of agriculture in the broadest and most comprehensive sense of that term," as the law declares they shall do, and thereby promoting every other interest in all our land. For the Department of Agriculture is the great productive, wealth-creating, and wealth-saving Department of our Government.

Testifying under oath last year before a committee of this House the chiefs of the various bureaus of this Department declared it to be their deliberate judgment that the money value of the Department to the people during that year had not been less than $231,000,000. That means that for every dollar expended for its maintenance during that year this Department had paid the people back $16. It means that for every dollar expended upon that Department from the first paltry thousand dollars, away back in 1839 down to the present hour, this Department, in a single year, gave back three and one-half dollars. This is one of the Government Departments that pays. It is one of the Departments an appropriation for which may be regarded as an investment and not as an expense.

Appreciating, therefore, the great importance of the work this Department is doing, your committee has given the bill, which is to provide for its maintenance, the most diligent and painstaking consideration.

Before Congress convened last December, the ranking minority member of the committee [Mr. LAMB] and the present chairman spent nearly four weeks in the Department, carefully studying the different bureaus and making themselves as familiar as possible with all their details. Beginning immediately after the holiday recess, the entire committee held daily hearings extending over a period of five weeks, taking up every item of the bill and questioning at length the Bureau officials who were responsible for the expenditure it provided. Following the public hearings, the subcommittee devoted a week to the preparation of the bill, when it was again submitted to the full committee for final review. Whatever may be its imperfections, therefore, the measure now before the House represents the very best judgment your committee is capable of exercising.

We believe it grants no dollar which is not needed by the public service, and we do not believe it withholds a dollar which the public service requires. It comes before you with a unanimous report from the committee, every member of the committee supporting every item in it, and it is respectfully submitted for the candid consideration of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I see that the committee has put a limitation on the power of the Secretary to rent or purchase road machines. Why was that done?

Mr. SCOTT. Because your committee does not believe it to be the function of the General Government to engage in the construction of public roads.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But you propose to give the Secretary the power to make practical investigation of the best methods of constructing roads, and yet you limit his power to do it.

Mr. SCOTT. We give him the power to investigate as to the best method of building roads, but we do not think it is necessary for the Department to go out and build the roads to determine the best methods any more than we believe it would be necessary for the agent of the Bureau of Plant Industry to plow the land and plant the seed himself when he goes into Texas or North Carolina to teach the people how to raise cotton in spite of the boll weevil.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the Secretary of Agriculture ask that this be discontinued, or that the limitation be put upon him?

Mr. SCOTT. I must say that the Secretary was not consulted about that matter. The committee simply exercised its best judgment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In my judgment, the best and most practical way of determining which is the best method of building a road is in the actual construction of the road.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall be glad to discuss the matter with the gentleman at greater length when we come to consider the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, the full and most complete and deeply interesting statement that we have listened to from the chairman of the committee must convince the House, what the Committee on Agriculture have known from the first day of the organization of that committee for the present Congress, that the mantle of the former worthy and indefatigable, earnest, and economical chairman of this committee, Mr. Wadsworth, of New York, has fallen on worthy shoulders in the person of the gentleman from Kansas. [Applause.] He has well stated that this bill has been carefully and conservatively prepared, so much so that I do not believe it possible for the other branch of this Congress to add anything to its provisions. And so carefully has it been considered and prepared in another direction that I do hope it leaves no opportunity for the point of order fiend, if I may so describe him, to exercise his energy.

I would not if I could, and I could not if I would, add anything to what has been so well said by the chairman in explaining this bill. One thing must have impressed this House, and that is that I was right from the first in contending that upon this agricultural bill, so important to the House and to the country, the debate should not have been limited to four hours' discussion. Although I agreed to it, I did it because I believed I could borrow two hours from that side when these gentlemen during Lent were better engaged, and under the five-minute rule these impecunious friends on this side would take something from under the five-minute rule. But when the splendid chairman of this committee has found it necessary—owing mostly, I think, to the interrogatories put to him—to take one-half of the time on his side, I do not see how we are to discuss the various measures here in the time that is left. But I do hope that this committee will allow the debate to run sufficient time to let the most of our friends on this side have an opportunity to express themselves.

I did hope to say something on one of the most important bills before this Agricultural Committee—the Appalachian chain and White Mountain bill—but I do not wish to take up the time. I never put anything in the RECORD that I do not say on the floor, and therefore I shall be debarred that pleasure and duty, from my view point. We know how last year an appropriation of $25,000 was made to sidetrack that measure, and how this year it has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. This will rob the people of this country of the benefits that must accrue from the bill, and call the previous question on the next generation of people in the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and, with the consent of the chairman on the other side, I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia does not control the time.

Mr. LAMB. Then I will reserve the balance of my time, except that I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. A member of the minority on the committee has requested recognition, and the Chair will have to recognize him first.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I waive my rights to be recognized now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, before I make the announcement for the purpose for which I rise, I want to ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks an address delivered by Moorfield Storey, of the State of Massachusetts, on "The duty of the United States toward the Philippine Islands," being a reply to a speech lately made by Secretary Taft.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to print in his remarks the document indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The document referred to is as follows:

THE DUTY OF THE UNITED STATES TOWARD THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS—A REPLY TO SECRETARY TAFT BY MOORFIELD STOREY.

"No great civilized power has ever managed with such wisdom and disinterestedness the affairs of a people committed by the accident of war to its hands. * * * Save only our attitude toward Cuba I question whether there is a brighter page in the annals of international dealing between the strong and the weak than the page which tells of our doings in the Philippines."

It is in such modest phrase that the President eulogizes the Philippine policy for which he is so largely responsible, and to support this proposition and to strengthen his own claims upon the confidence of the American people, Secretary Taft has made his speech to the ministers in Boston and written his elaborate report to the President.

The attitude of these gentlemen is natural, but experience does not justify us in relying too implicity upon the statements of officials as to the purposes and success of their own administration, national or municipal, and we must remember that from the dawn of history the oppressor has always insisted that oppression was good for the oppressed, and that his own action, to quote Secretary Taft's words, has been "altruistic."

History is constantly repeating itself. In the House of Representatives hardly more than fifty years ago human slavery in the United States was described "as a great moral, social, political, and religious blessing—a blessing to the slave and a blessing to the master," while Senator Hammond, of South Carolina, praised it as "a moral and humane institution, productive of the greatest political and social advantages." For years the strong forces of the nation, the ministers, the lawyers, the merchants, the bankers, the politicians, upheld it, and their speeches and writings were filled with evidence of its beneficent effects. These defenders of slavery were doubtless honest, but every American knows now how false their claims were. All admit that slavery was a curse to the master even more than to the slave and wonder how any men could ever have thought otherwise.

The result of all human experience was stated by Lincoln when he said:

"These arguments that are made that the inferior race are to be treated with as much allowance as they are capable of enjoying, that as much is to be done for them as their condition will allow—what are these arguments? They are the arguments that kings have made for the enslaving of the people in all ages of the world. You will find that all the arguments of kingcraft were always of this class; they always bestrode the necks of the people—not that they wanted to do it, but because the people were better for being ridden. * * * Turn it every way you will, whether it came from the mouth of a king as an excuse for enslaving the people of his country, or from the mouth of men of one race as a reason for enslaving the men of another race—it is all the same old serpent."

Thus did the greatest leader of the Republican party characterize more than fifty years ago the argument which is now made by him who aspires to sit in Lincoln's chair. Lincoln was a true prophet when he said in Springfield while describing the Declaration of Independence:

"Its authors meant it to be—as, thank God, it is now proving itself—a stumbling block to all those who in after times might seek to turn a free people back into the hateful paths of despotism. They knew the proneness of prosperity to breed tyrants, and they meant when such should reappear in this fair land and commence their vocation, they should find left for them at least one hard nut to crack."

His words might have been spoken to-day. Secretary Taft finds the Declaration of Independence a stumbling block, just as Lincoln prophesied, and we may judge how far to rely on his statements as to Philippine conditions by examining his argument against the Declaration of Independence.

On January 30 he said at Cleveland:

"Since the foundation of our Government the people of the United States, that is the States as distinguished from the Territories, have been engaged in governing other people. We did it in the case of Louisiana. We have done it in the case of every Territory that was subsequently admitted to the United States, and we are doing it to-day in the case of New Mexico and Arizona. What in principle is the difference between the assertion by Congress of the right to pass a law which shall be obeyed by men in New Mexico who have no voice in the selection of the Representatives and Senators who vote that law and the passing by Congress of such a law for the Government of the Philippines or Porto Rico? * * * If the latter is a violation of the Declaration of Independence, we have been violating the Declaration of Independence for a hundred years."

We may almost ask if the Secretary knows what the Declaration says. Its words are:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The people of the United States, beginning as a fringe of inhabitants on the edge of a continent, adopted a Constitution to which they consented. This Constitution gave to Congress control over the unoccupied land not belonging to any State, and in the exercise of that power Congress has adopted the policy of letting persons settle on this land and organize Territorial governments, and as these settlers have become sufficiently numerous in any region, of admitting that region as a State. To this policy the people as a whole have consented, and every man who has settled in a Territory has done it with knowledge of this policy and has consented to it. The governed in each Territory have consented to the government just as the man who enlists in the Army consents to obey the orders of his officers.

We acquired Louisiana by purchase, and by the treaty bound ourselves to incorporate its inhabitants in the Union and give them all the rights of American citizens, and we kept this obligation faithfully and promptly.

In the Philippine Islands there are some eight millions of people who have never consented to our Government, and whom we govern to-day simply because we were strong enough to overpower their resistance by force of arms. They are a people united in desiring their independence, and we refuse it because we say they are unfit to govern themselves.

Is it possible that so able a lawyer as Judge Taft has never detected this difference between the cases of Arizona and the Philippines? If he has not, what must we think of his legal acumen?

The distinction which Judge Taft is unable to see was very clear to President McKinley, whom Mr. Taft was eulogizing, for he said, in 1890, "The government by the people * * * must rest upon the free consent of the governed and of all the governed," and in 1898, when the Spanish war broke out, he said in his message to Congress: "I speak not of forcible annexation, for that, under our code of morals, would be criminal aggression," a phrase no one would think of using to describe the government of New Mexico. This speech of Secretary Taft at Cleveland must be remembered whenever we are weighing his statements. To him the Declaration of Independence has proved indeed "a stumbling block."

When we read the Secretary's speech at Boston, and the words of the President as to our dealings with the Filipinos, we wonder if the American people have forgotten the horrors of Samar and Batangas, the terrible destruction of Filipino life, the burning of cities and villages, the practice of reconcentration on a larger scale than was ever thought of by the Spaniards, the "water cure" and other tortures systematically employed, the misery and ruin which our conquest brought on the Filipino people! Have they forgotten how Aguinaldo was invited to aid us, how he was permitted to establish a government, how that government was destroyed? Have they forgotten that the first engagement, fought before the treaty was ratified and before we had any title to a foot of the Philippines, was, in the words of General Otis, "strictly defensive on the part of the insurgents and of vigorous attack by our forces?" Even then the Filipinos were already called "insurgents," though they were still, on Mr. Taft's theory, subjects of Spain. Have they forgotten that we refused even to treat with them after the battle; that, in the words of Mr. McKinley, we would have "no useless parley?" Have they forgotten the massacre of Mount Dajo? If there is a darker chapter in the history of the dealings between a strong and a weak people, it must be many centuries ago. Secretary Taft at Grand Rapids ventured to say that Abraham Lincoln "would have approved the Philippine policy from the beginning to the end." Can any man who has read Lincoln's words believe that he could have approved this record of treachery and bloodshed?

But men say, Why revive these memories that we would fain obliterate? Because to deal with the problem of the Philippine Islands properly we must never forget the history of our occupation, and when we are considering whether we are more fit to govern them than they are to govern themselves, we must remember what our representatives have done, and must ever keep in mind that what has happened during the last eight years may well happen again. The American people like to think themselves more capable than any other nation, but we can not settle this great question wisely unless we face the facts. Misrepresentation and concealment do not help us to a just decision. Secretary Taft from the outset of his career has never laid before the American people the naked truth. Were all the facts known, they would prove the truth of Lincoln's famous words:

"No man is good enough to govern another without that other's consent. I say this is the leading principle, the sheet anchor of American republicanism." "When the white man governs himself that is self-government, but when he governs himself and also governs another man, that is more than self-government, that is despotism."

Our course has proved that we are no exception to the rule laid down by John Stuart Mill:

"The government of a people by itself has a meaning and a reality, but such a thing as a government of one people by another does not and can not exist. * * * If the good of the governed is the proper business of a government, it is utterly impossible that a people should directly attend to it;" and unless we recognize this truth, we are destined to learn it by bitter experience.

It is very pleasant to read in Mr. Taft's report that "The national policy is to govern the Philippine Islands for the benefit and welfare and uplifting of the people of the islands, and gradually to extend to them, as they shall show themselves fit to exercise it, a greater and greater measure of popular self-government," and "that when the Filipino people as a whole show themselves reasonably fit to conduct a popular self-government, maintaining law and order and offering equal protection of the laws and civil rights to rich and poor, and desire complete independence of the United States, they shall be given it." It is pleasant to find the President saying more explicitly that their "complete independence" is a goal of which "we desire that it be reached at as early a date as possible for the sake of the Filipinos and for our own sake."

This assertion of altruistic benevolence, this declaration of a policy whose sole object is the advancement of the Filipinos, shows a marked advance since the day when Senator LODGE, as president of the Republican national convention, said in his address to the convention:

"We make no hypocritical pretense of being interested in the Philippines solely on account of others. While we regard the welfare of these people as a sacred trust, we regard the welfare of the American people first. We see our duty to ourselves as well as to others. We believe in trade expansion."

The contrast shows progress in the right direction. Secretary Taft and the anti-imperialists are in accord as to their object. There remain simply the questions of how to reach that end and how to decide when it is attained.

Mr. Taft's first postulate is that they are now incapable of governing themselves. He uses the argument which Lincoln ascribes to the opponents of political freedom: "They said some men are too ignorant and vicious to share in government." Again history repeats itself.

He said at Boston, that when the war with the Filipinos began, "Aguinaldo had established some sort of government in the provinces, but it was an arbitrary, tyrannical, military government under the guise of something better, but full of a corruption quite equal to that which they could complain of in the Spanish times."

Secretary Taft did not reach Manila till after this government had been broken up, and does not, therefore, speak from personal knowledge. Against his statement let us put the words of our naval and military commanders and of a witness, upon whom, in dealing with such questions, two Administrations have seemed to rely, the Hon. John Barrett, Chief of the Bureau of South American Republics.

Admiral Dewey, on June 27, 1898, cabled:

"In my opinion, these people are far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, and I am familiar with both races."

General Merritt, on his arrival in Paris in October, 1898, was reported as saying:

"The Filipinos impress me very favorably. I think great injustice was done the native population. * * * They are more capable of self-government than, I think, the Cubans are. They are considered to be good Catholics. They have lawyers, doctors, and men of kindred professions, who stand well in the community and bear favorable comparison with those other countries. They are dignified, courteous, and reserved."

John Barrett saw the government organized by the Filipinos in operation and described it as "a government which has practically been administering the affairs of that great island [Luzon] since the American possession of Manila, and which is certainly better than the former administration. It has a properly formed cabinet and congress, the members of which in appearance and manner would compare favorably with Japanese statesmen. The congressmen, whose sessions I repeatedly attended, conducted themselves with great decorum and showed a knowledge of debate and parliamentary law that would not compare unfavorably with the Japanese parliament. The executive portion of the government was made up of a ministry of bright men, who seemed to understand their respective positions," while among Aguinaldo's advisers were "men of acknowledged ability as international lawyers."

Mr. Taft says in his report, "No one denies that 80 per cent of the Filipino people are densely ignorant * * *." And again, "It is not too much to say that knowledge of Spanish is a fairly good indication whether an individual can be said to be educated."

Against this judgment let me call two witnesses who have been in the islands.

Captain Hatch, of the Eighteenth Infantry, after serving for more than a year in the islands and being brought in contact with thousands of the people, said:

"The Filipinos are Malays softened by contact with the Spaniards. * * * The Filipino is essentially honest. * * * The Filipinos are a deeply religious people. * * * They are a temperate, sober people. During a year's residence among them I never saw a drunken Filipino. They are a cleanly people. They are hospitable, and they are generous in their hospitality. They are not an ignorant people. Their intelligence and educational progress are apt to be underestimated because of failure to understand them. Nearly every adult can read and write in the Tagalo or Viscayan dialect, while the natives of the cities and villages, in addition, can read and write the Spanish language. Moreover, most adults know something of arithmetic, geography, and history. I was surprised one day, in questioning the driver of my quily, an ordinary poor boy of 18, to find that he had studied geometry, and had made very material progress.

"The Filipinos are not so much different from other people. Their customs, habits, hopes, and aspirations are deep seated. Their leaders are shrewd, bright men of much ability; the masses are earnest in their loyalty."

An American Congressman, Mr. Shafroth, who visited the islands, said:

"The general impression exists among many Americans that the Philippine people are savages. A visit to the islands will certainly dispel any such delusion. * * *

"When I find behind the prescription desks of the numerous drug stores of the islands, even when kept by Americans and Englishmen, Filipinos compounding medicines taken from bottles labeled in Latin; when I see behind the counters of banks having large capital natives acting as bookkeepers and as receiving and paying tellers; when I find them as merchants and clerks in almost all lines of business, as telegraph operators and ticket agents, conductors and engineers upon railroads, and as musicians rendering upon almost all instruments high-class music; when I am told that they alone make the observations and intricate calculations at the Manila observatory, and that prior to the insurrection there were 2,100 schools in the islands and 5,000 students in attendance at the Manila university; when I find the better class living in good, substantial, and sometimes elegant houses, and many of them pursuing professional occupations I can not but conclude that it is a vile slander to compare these people to the Apaches or the American Indians.

"The best evidence of the ability of the Philippine people to govern themselves is that they possess a large intelligent class, thoroughly identified in interest with the islands, and capable of administering good government. The civil commission has recognized this ability by recently adding three native members to that governing body; by appointing three Filipino judges of the supreme court; by selecting about half of the judges of the first instance and nearly all the governors of the provinces from that race, and by appointing a solicitor-general and many other officers from the natives. Are these officials not in the governing business, and do they not perform their work as well as the Americans? Is it possible that they are capable of governing because they were appointed by the representatives of a distant nation? Would they lose that ability if elected or chosen by properly constituted authority of their own? In the latter event they would make far better officers, because they would consult only the interest of their own people instead of that of a nation 7,000 miles away."

By force of arms we destroyed Aguinaldo's government, "arbitrary, tyrannical, military." Instead of trying to help the Filipinos build up a state, we began by destroying all that they had built. Was our government less tyrannical, less military, less arbitrary?

The following report of Gen. J. F. Bell, written at Christmas time in the year 1901, answers the question:

"I am now assembling in the neighborhood of 2,500 men who will be used in columns of about fifty men each. I take so large a command for the purpose of thoroughly searching each ravine, valley, and mountain peak for insurgents and for food, expecting to destroy everything I find outside of towns. All able-bodied men will be killed or captured. Old men, women, and children will be sent to towns. This movement begins January 1, by which time I hope to have nearly all the food supply in the towns. These people need a thrashing, to teach them some good common sense; and they should have it for the good of all concerned."

And that these ruthless measures have not been discontinued is apparent from the following order issued May 24, 1906, by Capt. Walter A. Smith, senior inspector of the constabulary of Negros, to the commanding officer of a squad consisting of fifteen or twenty men detailed to capture an outlaw named Isio:

"All country around Masasoh, Manjuija, Magtacay, and other sitios in that locality must be covered and everything destroyed by cutting down or by fire. * * * All people caught in these places should be turned over to Lieutenant Mohler for work. * * * Have your men take lots of ammunition and kill everything that runs from the constabulary except women and children."

Yet Secretary Taft said at Grand Rapids that the Filipinos "are now enjoying the right to life, liberty, and property and the pursuit of happiness and freedom from deprivation of any of those rights, except by due process of law." Does Judge Taft, as an eminent lawyer, assert that the men whose prosperity is destroyed and whose lives are taken under such an order as this lose them by "due process of law?"

This last order was issued in time of peace, and is an illustration of our tenderness in dealing with a weaker people. This order was printed in the Manila Opinion, an American newspaper, on December 7, 1907. Has the officer who gave that order been punished? Could Aguinaldo's government have been more arbitrary?

The massacre of Mount Dajo, in March, 1906, where some 600 men, women, and children were slaughtered, was at least "military," if not "arbitrary and tyrannical."

Nor is this all. On July 4, 1902, President Roosevelt declared the war in the Philippines at an end and issued his proclamation of amnesty. Then "tranquillity" had been fully established. In the year 1902 reconcentration was used to suppress insurrection in Laguna and Batangas. It then affected not less than 100,000 people in camps holding from 8,000 to 14,000 people each, according to the official report of Colonel Wagner. In 1903, when every Filipino is said to have had all the civil rights secured to an American citizen by the bill of rights save the right to bear arms and to trial by jury, 300,000 persons were driven from their homes into reconcentration camps in Albay, where very large areas were entirely denuded of population. Fifteen thousand people in Tayabas suffered a like fate. In 1904 some 20,000 people in Samar and 16,000 in Cavite, close to the walls of Manila, were dealt with in like manner. In 1905 reports reached us of like operations. We heard from Bakoor that "its unfortunate reconcentrated people, the inhabitants of the districts of Ligas and St. Nicholas, a pleasant land situated by the seaside, are subjected to vigorous surveillance, not allowed to walk abroad with impunity, obliged to snatch their sleep in motley heaps of men, women, and children, exposed by night and day to the elements" and every hardship which the terrible word "reconcentration" implies. Like reports came from Batangas, but these found no place in the dispatches from the Philippine Islands. We learned the facts from the Manila press.

Imagine 300,000 people charged with no crime taken from their homes anywhere in America because the Government wished to catch a gang of robbers. Would no constitutional right be invaded by such a process? What a mockery it is to claim that the Filipinos are secured in their civil rights when such barbarities are common. Secretary Taft is a good lawyer. Let him reconcile these facts with his claim.

And Aguinaldo's government was "full of corruption." How about our own? Secretary Taft's statement about Aguinaldo is a charge. There may be another side. His statement about our own Government is a confession. He says, "I am sorry to say that in the early days, when we were dependent on picking up what Americans we could, we did not give the Filipinos the best exhibition of our own regard for public welfare in office, for we had some sixteen provincial treasurers that became defaulters." The list of such crimes is larger now. A commander of the Filipino Scouts at the St. Louis Exposition has been convicted of forging vouchers, and instances might be multiplied. Are we Americans, with public officials everywhere on trial or under indictment, if not already convicted, with the Pennsylvania capitol, our great life insurance companies, our land frauds, and the whole melancholy catalogue, are we sure that our representatives in these distant islands are likely to prove more honest than our mayors, our senators, our bank presidents, our city treasurers at home? Filipinos by thousands were ready to give up their lives for their country's freedom. Is it not reasonable to suppose that in such a people there were men enough to appreciate that public office is a trust? We certainly have not governed the Filipinos better than they were governing themselves when we overthrew their government.

The practical effect of our policy may be judged from these statistics, which are taken from a letter addressed by representatives of Batangas to Secretary Taft on August 26, 1905. They show what has been going on in the municipality of Balayan, in the province of Batangas.

In 1896 the number of inhabitants in that municipality was 41,308. In 1905 it was 13,924. The area of cultivated land, in hectares, was 19,500 in 1896, and 1,700 in 1905—not 10 per cent. Products: Rice, 39,020 cavanes in 1896, and 12,500 cavanes in 1900; sugar, 520,000 picos in 1896, now 12,300 picos; maize, 110,000 cavanes in 1896, now 10,000 cavanes; the oxen then were 10,000, now 427; the cows then were 3,650, now 80; carabaos, oxen, 4,110 in 1896, now 433; carabaos, cows, 1,350 in 1896, now 92; there were 11,000 hogs then, there are now 2,800; there were 96,000 hens, there are now 5,000. Consider what a story these figures tell.

Only this autumn the Filipino Chamber of Commerce has sent to the municipalities a petition for signature which begins:

"Whereas it is palpable and notorious that the country is undergoing a period of serious and profound trial, especially in respect to agriculture,

"Whereas the condition of the fields this year gives the sad prospects of a harvest that will mean special poverty and hunger, in addition to the evils already experienced."

A government such as ours, whether we judge it by its methods or its results, can not succeed. We may build better roads, we may improve sewers, we may establish schools, we may teach better sanitation, and tax the Filipinos to pay for them, but after the catalogue of our good acts is complete we can not wipe from Filipino memories our past, nor can we avoid Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman's true statement, "Good government is no equivalent for self-government."

A great majority of American publicists, including the President, have declared themselves unequivocally in favor of Philippine independence. Mr. Taft alone, while setting it before his countrymen as the goal toward which we must look, seems not to desire it. He postpones the day for a generation at least, and when that time is gone he hopes that both countries will agree "that it would be mutually beneficial to continue a governmental relation between them like that between England and Australia." That is his hope, and so long as he can control our policy his object must be to realize that hope. As though it were possible for a country adapted only for the habitation of an alien race to hold a position toward a "parent nation" like that of a territory peopled and occupied by its own emigrants!

He prophesies "that during the next twenty-five years a development will take place in the agriculture and other business of the Philippine Islands which will be as remarkable in its benefits to the United States and the Philippine Islands as was the development of Alaska during the last ten or fifteen years."

He insists that "the presence of Americans in the islands is essential to the due development of the lower classes." He wants the American Government to remain in the islands "long enough to educate the entire people," which means an indefinite future when we consider how long it has taken and will take to educate our own people. He thinks that "meantime they will be able to see and the American public will come to see the enormous material benefit to both arising from the maintenance of some sort of a bond between the two countries." He insists that "the having such an outpost as the Philippines making the United States an Asiatic power for the time will be of immense benefit to its merchants and its trade." He recommends that "the present restrictions be removed as to the acquisition of mining claims and the holding of lands by corporations in the Philippines." He does not "think it improper in order to secure support for the policy of the Administration to point out the advantage to the United States of holding the islands." He wishes to attract American capital and to see American investments in railroads, mines, and plantations. He wishes, in a word, to plant as much American treasure in the islands as possible, knowing that where the treasure is the heart is, to make it as much for American interest to retain the islands as possible, and under cover of much vague talk about the benevolent purpose of the United States to fit the Filipinos for self-government, to pursue a policy which will create in America a strong sentiment against letting American investments go under Filipino control. Everyone knows that the demands of capital have led the English Government and others to conquer and annex foreign territory and no one can doubt that every American dollar planted in the Philippines will become an argument against their independence. Let Secretary Taft tell us in detail how these islands in twenty-five years are to become of such remarkable value to the United States—a value which could accrue only to a few exploiters who would doubtless enforce a demand for imported contract labor, driving the natives to the wall and benefiting themselves at the expense of the domestic industries of the United States—let Mr. Taft elucidate his programme fully and it will be apparent that the process means the permanence of our hold upon the islands.

While this development was proceeding for the advantage of a small group of capitalists, the absolute responsibility of the United States for the defense of the archipelago would continue. In the changed attitude of affairs in the East, which Mr. Taft ignores, this responsibility implies increased outlays for fortifications and an indefinitely increased naval force, of which the millions to be asked of the present Congress are only the small beginnings. If any one doubts that Mr. Taft's policy does not mean Philippine independence, let him observe that after the value of the islands to America has been demonstrated and the question of giving them their independence comes up for decision the Secretary bids us note "that the tribunal to decide whether the proper political capacity exists to justify independence is Congress and not the Philippine electorate. * * * The judgment of a people as to their own political capacity is not an unerring guide." Can anyone be so blind as not to see what Secretary Taft's policy is and that it does not mean Philippine independence at all? Let the strong nation that finds the islands profitable decide whether to let them go? It is a bribed tribunal which will decide the question, and the policy of Secretary Taft is to create a situation which makes independence impossible. Is the judgment of a people as to another's political capacity more unerring than as to its own, especially when its own interests are at stake?

Secretary Taft may be right or wrong, but his real meaning is disguised by his talk of benevolence. In the words which Lincoln ascribed to tyrants, "The inferior race are to be treated with as much allowance as they are capable of enjoying, as much is to be done for them as their condition will allow;" they are to become invaluable to the United States, and our Congress is to decide whether they shall be given their independence. Well did Lincoln say, "It is all the same old serpent."

Through their own self-government now lies the road to Filipino independence and advancement. In the words of Lincoln, addressed prophetically to Mr. Taft, "By your system you would always keep them ignorant and vicious." In the words of President Roosevelt a year or two ago, "It is as true of a race as of an individual that while outsiders can help to a certain degree yet the real help must come in the shape of self-help." Men learn to be independent by being independent—by their own mistakes. To say that the object of our policy is to help the Filipinos to self-government and ultimate independence by making them as valuable to the United States as possible, and then letting the United States decide whether to give them independence is "to keep the word of promise to our ear and break it to our hope." We assume the position of trustee for this nation and unfit ourselves to discharge our trust impartially. The statesman who proposes this may deceive himself, but we must not let him deceive us.

It is for the interest of both countries that the Philippines be given their independence now. To-day the United States can obtain without doubt from the powers, including Japan, a consent to the neutralization of the islands, a protection of their independence from foreign aggression. A few years hence that consent may not be obtained. The time is ripe for the passage of a joint resolution declaring our intention to grant the Filipinos absolute independence within a short term of years. Every year's delay is dangerous, and dangerous to us.

The forces which make for Filipino independence are irresistible. "The mills of God grind slowly," and for a time we may hold these islands, as for a time we held the negroes in slavery. The interests which made for the preservation and extension of slavery were strong, far stronger than any interest which we now have in holding the Philippines, but they were not strong enough. The fortunes which were invested in slaves were lost, and no nation ever paid dearer for wrong than did this nation by the civil war and its indelible effects. So also will it happen again. The dollars and the lives spent to hold these islands will be wasted, the fortunes invested there will be lost, and the longer we delay to do them justice the greater the penalty we must pay. We are sinning against light. Soft words and fair promises can not prevail.

For He that worketh high and wise,
Nor pauses in His plan,
Will take the sun out of the skies
Ere freedom out of man.

Mr. Taft, at Grand Rapids, spoke of the "unreasonable opposition and the almost traitorous sympathy with the opposition to our Government in the Philippines displayed by the anti-imperialists." Is it indeed treason in any American to sympathize with the aspirations of a people for liberty; to assert the self-evident truths of the Declaration of Independence—to resist those who, in Lincoln's words, would "turn a free people back into the hateful paths of despotism?" Are such words as these becoming in a man who aspires to be the Chief Magistrate of a free nation?

History again repeats itself. In 1854 a Senator from Tennessee charged that Boston was "filled with traitors," meaning those of her citizens who were opposed to slavery. Charles Sumner's reply may be used again to answer Secretary Taft. "The charge is not new. Boston of old was the home of Hancock and Adams. Her traitors now are those who are truly animated by the spirit of the American Revolution. In condemning them, in condemning Massachusetts, in condemning these remonstrants, you simply give proper conclusion to the utterance on this floor that the Declaration of Independence is a self-evident lie."

Finally, Secretary Taft at Grand Rapids said, "Is there room for doubt that Abraham Lincoln would have approved the policy of McKinley and Roosevelt in maintaining our position as a world power, in increasing the size of our Navy, so that when we do intervene in international affairs we may exercise an influence commensurate with our greatness as a nation?" Against this lamentable doctrine of might, which makes our greatness depend on guns and ships, we would oppose the true faith that "righteousness exalteth a nation;" that a scrupulous regard for the rights of others, however weak and whatever their race or color, a consistent policy of justice to all men, an example of ordered freedom, will give us a far more powerful influence on mankind and make us a far greater world power than all the guns and all the ships that our enormous wealth can buy. We would have our country and its influence such as Emerson described in speaking of Boston and Massachusetts:

"Pole-star of light in Europe's night
That never faltered from the right.
Kings shook with fear; old empires crave
The secret force to find,
Which fired the little State to save
The rights of all mankind."

Let us hope that this fire will ever burn in Massachusetts, and that she will never lack such traitors as Adams, Sumner, Hoar, and Boutwell to keep it alight.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the second place, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to print as a part of my remarks a petition and memorial to the Congress of the United States by the Association of Friends of the city of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the authorization at this session of Congress of the building of four new battle ships.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The document referred to is as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia respectfully enters an earnest protest against the authorization at this session of Congress of the building of four new battle ships, with cruisers, docks, etc., aggregating an expenditure in excess of $60,000,000.

Your remonstrants urge the following considerations in support of their protest:

NATIONAL PERIL ONLY JUSTIFICATION OF A GREAT NAVY.

The unprecedented rapid growth of our Navy can be justified on grounds of grave national peril only.

ACTION OF SECOND HAGUE CONGRESS LESSENS NEED OF NAVY.

No such peril appears in any direction. On the contrary, within a year the action of the second Hague conference did away with the bombardment of unfortified towns, and three-fourths of the countries of the world went on record as advocating the protection of private property at sea in time of war; assurance was given of the establishment of a court of nations at The Hague, and the cause of international arbitration treaties received renewed life.

ALL FOREIGN RELATIONS NOW AMICABLE.

The relations of our Government with other countries are amicable and give promise of stable peace. Those in positions of authority and knowledge in America and in Japan assure us that the recent questions at issue have never threatened a break in the friendly relations of the two countries, but that the deplorable agitation of the public mind was created by misinformed persons and a sensational press.

GREAT NAVY MEANS INCREASED BURDEN FOR UNPRODUCTIVE PURPOSES.

The vast and constantly increasing expenditure for naval purposes is adding to the burden of taxation in a time of financial uncertainty and business depression.

Such expenditure diverts national revenue from useful and productive projects of internal development and improvement now urgently demanded by the needs of the country to facilitate commerce and promote the general welfare.

PACIFIC RELATIONS IN PAST DUE TO NATIONAL PROBITY.

History teaches that the immunity from foreign wars and aggression enjoyed by our country is due not to a great navy and an imposing military establishment, but to our national policy of friendliness, candor, and pure intent in international affairs. This policy has made "American diplomacy" a term of honor among nations.

NAVAL EXPANSION UN-AMERICAN.

The policy of naval and military expansion is new to our country. It suggests a change of base from the principles of our fathers, an attitude of unrest, self-assertion, and display that is undignified and out of keeping with our national genius.

UNITED STATES A REFUGE FOR WAR-BURDENED FOREIGNERS.

A large and rapidly increasing part of our population has come to the United States to escape economic, social, and governmental conditions created by military burdens and the inheritance of old wars. These citizens are not in sympathy with a movement to restore them to a condition from which they sacrificed much to be free.

APPEAL TO BRUTE FORCE SELDOM FINAL.

There is a growing sentiment, already widely entertained, that war is a barbarous method that settles controversies on a basis of mere physical force and not of justice and righteousness. Arbitration, on the contrary, appeals strongly to our people as a method based on equity and reason.

JUDICIAL APPEAL INCREASINGLY EFFECTIVE.

By reason of the progress of recent years, and the facilities afforded at The Hague, international arbitration is as much a part of the world's government as the law courts are part of the national life. For two civilized nations to rush into arms over a controversy that can be settled rightly only by judicial action is regarded now as an act of criminal folly.

PRESENT NAVY ADEQUATE FOR POLICE PURPOSES.

Hence it appears that the naval force should be regarded only as national police. Your remonstrants believe that our present Navy is amply large for this purpose, and should not be increased. Any large addition to our present force is likely to become a menace and source of danger rather than a protection.

SUMMARY.

Therefore your remonstrants urge upon you, as chosen representatives of the people, the defeat of this proposed legislation, because they believe it to be inexpedient and unnecessary, wasteful of the national revenue, contrary to our historical development and national genius, at variance with the sentiment of a large proportion of the people of the United States, and contrary to the international policy of a Christian nation that has stood before the world as a leader in peace and an exponent of justice and friendliness.

Signed by authority and on behalf of the Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia.

STANLEY R. YARNALL, Vice-President.

PHILADELPHIA, Third Month, 9th, 1908.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the country, and I believe that the Members of the House upon the Republican side of the aisle will agree with me that, acting as minority leader, thus far this session I have given the majority perfectly "smooth sailing." I have not wanted to be regarded as factious; I have not wanted the country to think that the minority on this side was trying to assume responsibility for legislation. I knew that responsibility rested with the majority, and I did not want to appear to coerce the majority—and very little coercing can the minority do—until that majority had made absolute demonstration before the country of the fact that it does not intend to do anything at his session of Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And that, too, notwithstanding the fact that your President has issued a programme that he calls upon you to execute, and notwithstanding the fact that the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] announced early in the session that unless you did execute that programme somebody was going to "get run over" and "get hurt."

I have waited like a Democratic lamb ready for the slaughter, waiting for the Republican party to do something. I have finally come to the conclusion that the Republican party in this House has forgotten how to do anything; it has become the party of negation, of passivity, and, as far as I can see, has no idea of doing anything. [Applause on Democratic side.] It is plain now that without some method of parliamentary coercion you are going to be deaf to every demand of the country. The minority can not exercise much power, but it has some power, and I want to make the announcement now, that from this moment on to the balance of this session this is not going to be a lie-easy, wait-on-the-enemy campaign [applause on the Democratic side], and that the little parliamentary power the minority has under the rules is going to be exercised. The minority has a right to refuse unanimous consent to legislation. It has the right to call for the yeas and nays upon every affirmative matter of legislation. I now make the announcement that no requests for unanimous consent from that side of the aisle, unless it be to adjourn or to take a recess—in which two cases I believe it is not from a parliamentary standpoint necessary to have unanimous consent—will not be granted during the balance of this session until the majority shows that it is alive to the demands of the country sufficiently to report for consideration in this House, or to give me satisfactory assurance that they will report for consideration, the following bills:

First, an employers' liability bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You have been wasting too much time over it. You have been permitting your Judiciary Committee to have hearing upon hearing, and you have been using that bill merely as a buffer in order to prevent hearing upon other essential legislation before that committee, which legislation you hope to evade.

Second, I shall refuse unanimous consent until you report to this House for its consideration some publicity of campaign contributions bill [applause on the Democratic side], whether it be the bill offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] or some other bill. I care not whose name is attached to it, Republican or Democrat.

Third, I shall refuse unanimous consent for any request upon that side of the Chamber until the Ways and Means Committee of this House, in response to the overwhelming demand of the entire newspaper and magazine fraternity of this country, Republican as well as Democrat, shall bring to the consideration of this House a bill for free wood pulp and free print paper. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Fourth, I shall make the same declination until the Clayton bill, now pending before the Judiciary Committee, or some other bill embodying like provisions, shall have been reported out of that committee for the consideration of this House. What the Clayton bill does is this: It prevents mere ex parte and temporary injunctions, where only one side has been heard from, acting as a supersedeas of a law passed by a sovereign State.

I do not deny the right, upon final hearing of the injunction when it is made permanent, to set aside a State law, if in the opinion of a Federal court it violates the Constitution of the United States, but I do deny the right, upon a mere ex parte hearing by means of a temporary injunction without hearing the State's side at all, of a subordinate court of the United States to sit in judgment on the constitutionality of the legislation of a sovereign State. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am reenforced in that opinion by the fact that under the original judicial act of the courts had no such power, and for years and years afterwards had no such power, and could not issue an injunction until they had heard both sides, with reasonable notice to both sides. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about that, and how far I am going, I desire to read this Clayton bill, though I do not insist upon this particular bill. Bring in a bill in the name of the chairman of the committee; bring in a bill in the name of a Republican, claim the credit for it, go before the country and get the credit for it—you have a right to do it; that I admit, and I would be glad to see you do it, for I am never better satisfied than at the unusual spectacle of the Republican party serving the country. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The Clayton bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any circuit or district court of the United States or any circuit or district judge of the United States to issue any injunction or order prohibiting or restraining the execution of any State law in all cases except where final trial has been had and final judgment or final decree has been rendered declaring such State law to be in violation of the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.

SEC. 2. That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any circuit or district court or any circuit or district judge of the United States to issue any injunction or restraining order prohibiting or restraining any State officers or any persons from executing any State law in all cases except where final trial has been had and final judgment or final decree has been rendered declaring such State law to be in violation of the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.

Thomas Jefferson said we ought to preserve the rights of the States as the best security for individual liberty and local self-government. He also stated that we ought to guard with equal care the delegated powers of the Federal Government as our only safeguard for national independence and national peace and progress. I would not take from the Federal Government one of the powers that have been delegated to it. I would not for a moment join in an attack upon the courts of the United States for declaring a State law or a Federal law unconstitutional when in their honest opinion they deem it to be so, but I do say that it is as little as any man who loves his State and believes in local self-government can demand to ask that no mere subordinate Federal court should exercise this newly derived power to set aside an act of a State upon a mere ex parte hearing from the attorneys and the witnesses of a railroad corporation or of anybody else, much less to forbid a State to be heard in its own defense. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, Mr. Chairman, if after some time I do not notice signs of amendment on that side of the Chamber and a disposition to do something—to quit this policy of passivity and mere negation and "stand-patism"—if I do not note some disposition to awake to the idea that you are representatives of the American people and ought to be doing something in their interests, then I shall use about the only other power that the minority has, and that is to call for a yea-and-nay vote upon every affirmative proposition, however insignificant, presented to this House for passage. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration carries a total appropriation of $11,431,346, the amount deemed necessary by the committee to meet the legitimate growth of the work of the Department of Agriculture for the coming fiscal year. This Department directs its efforts to the improvement and conservation of the nation's predominant industry. The problems of agriculture cover a vast expanse of territory and involve every phase of farm life. Forty millions of our people, with an invested capital of over $25,000,000,000, coax from the soil their happiness and prosperity and at the same time supply a never-failing source of permanent wealth to the nation. The true measure of the industrial greatness of any country is the size of the bank books of its farmers, and their natural, inherent conservatism is the true gauge of the character, stability, and morale of its citizenship.

To increase the prosperity of these people, to solve the problems of their great occupation, to get a maximum return from the latent possibilities of the soil, to conserve the fruits of years of labor, and to blaze a pathway into new fields of conquest, is the work of the Department of Agriculture. Fundamentally it is missionary and educational. To agriculture it is a veritable John the Baptist, whose zealous preachments are working a revolution in farm conditions, while at the same time it is a great university whose teachings are the inspiration and guidance of the farmers of the country. To teach and to lead more than 36 per cent of our population to a more complete dominion over nature, to bring them into the fullest possession of God's richest bequeathment, is the province of this arm of the Government's service. Such is the great work, the most comprehensive in scope and possible results, this Department undertakes to do, and, happily for the well-being of the nation, it does it in a great and comprehensive way.

Because of the very character of the work of the Department it is not possible to measure in mere dollars the value of its work to the country, but we do know that it has helped to send the farm boy and farm girl to college, put music in the farm home, planted flowers in the farmyard, and made farm life attractive and profitable. We know it has improved general farm conditions, set in motion new thoughts, awakened new ambitions, planted new hopes, quickened endeavor, added dignity, and brought to the farmer as a class a new independence. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a disposition to criticise and find fault with this bill. It is said the increases carried by it are unusually large. We are told that the country is in a state of panic, that we are facing a deficit in the Treasury, and the pruning knife must be put to all appropriations.

It is true that the country is in a state of panic, but whose panic is it? Who brought it about? I do not hear of any farmers reducing wages or dismissing their employees; I see no account of cessation of farm operations because of hard times, nor have I read of any farmer blowing out his brains because of failures. His productions last year were the greatest in the life of the nation. There was no decrease in his contribution to the national wealth. It is not the farmer's panic; he is not responsible for it, and no friend of agriculture can justify a vote to curtail and hamper the admirable work of the farmers' department of the Government, because, forsooth, the speculators and stock gamblers of Wall street are having a row, and are now engaged in the delightful pastime of swallowing each other. Let me call the attention of the critics of this bill to the fact that the farmer will continue to make his annual contribution to the nation's exchequer in spite of railroad wars, crashing banks, depreciating stocks and bonds, and financial crises. [Applause.]

Let me impress upon them that his brain and brawn produced a crop last year the value of which was $7,500,000,000, approximately as much as the combined capital of the manufacturing establishments of this country, and that they sold products abroad valued at over $1,000,000,000, which brought back to the nation as a balance of trade $444,000,000. These gentlemen who would make the farmer help bear the burden of a self-made political stock-gamblers' panic by cutting the appropriations in this bill forget or do not appreciate the fact that it is to the farmer that this nation owes supremacy in the markets of the world; that he makes the balance in favor of the United States in her international trade relations. [Applause.]

It is true that a deficit in the Treasury threatens us, but I would remind gentlemen that it is not the result of extravagant appropriations to the Department of Agriculture. Compared to other appropriations, the amount carried by this bill is a mere insignificant bagatelle. The total appropriations for all purposes for the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress were $919,948,679.63, of which agriculture received $9,447,290, or about one dollar out of every one hundred appropriated, and the same ratio will be maintained in the appropriations of this Congress. It may be wise legislation to appropriate $145,937,000 for pensions and at the same time appropriate only $37,183,093, and that only every other year, for the great work of improving our rivers and harbors—the nation's highways of commerce; it may be wise statesmanship to appropriate millions for the District of Columbia, the Indians, and the diplomatic and consular service every year, while appropriations for needed public buildings throughout the country must await a plethoric condition of the Treasury; it may be good policy to appropriate approximately $200,000,000 annually for the support of the Army and naval services, while only a little over $11,000,000 are intrusted to the Department of Agriculture for its work in the aid of the most important and fundamental industry of the nation. The excuse given by gentlemen of statesmanship pretensions who each year, uncomplainingly and without fault-finding, vote this enormous burden upon the taxpayers for the maintenance of the Army and Navy, is that the one guarantees internal peace and order, while the other is a protection against external dangers.

Oh, statesmanship, the follies committed in thy name! If gentlemen would insure internal peace and order, if they would anchor this nation securely and forever to its ancient constitutional moorings, if they would protect it from the dangerous restlessness of overcrowded city conditions, if they would insure it with strength and permanent stability, let them look to the welfare of the farmer, to the improvement of his condition, to the bettering of his homelife and to the making of his great occupation profitable, for after all the full smokehouse and corncrib are the nation's surest safeguard! [Applause.] Give to the nation a great army of happy and contented farmers, equip its great industrial classes with prosperity, keep full their dinner pails by wise and patriotic legislation, and the necessity for a burdensome standing army ceases to exist. [Applause.]

But gentlemen argue that internal peace is no defense against external dangers and assert, with the emphasis of profound belief, that a great navy must stand between us and the warlike nations of the earth. This thought has moved them to increase enormously the strength of the Navy in recent years and to ask even greater increases for the future. These gentlemen, and I have every confidence in their integrity of belief, would add $40,000,000 to the present naval bill to provide four additional first-class battle ships. I do not disagree to a programme which looks to a gradual increase in the naval strength of the country, but I confess a doubt as to the wisdom of an attempt to establish an efficient navy in a day. I am inclined to disagree, too, with the idea that a great navy affords us any guaranty of permanent peace with the world. The bully who carries a chip on his shoulder is apt to find some one willing to undertake to knock it off, and whether a great navy is a security or a menace is, in the minds of our most conservative thinkers, a debatable question. But everyone agrees, even the jingo and alarmist, that no nation which is dependent in a large measure upon ours for its food and clothing is likely to be hasty in precipitating a quarrel with us.

You may not like the grocer or the dry goods merchant, who are your only sources of supply for the prime necessities of life; you may have a positive dislike for them, but the strong probability is that you will be careful about communicating the fact to them. And, Mr. Chairman, as long as the United States furnishes the world 34 per cent of its corn, 24 per cent of its wheat, 45.27 per cent of its meat products, and 66.6 per cent of its cotton, so long will the world hesitate to precipitate a disturbance with us. I put against the Army and the Navy, as instrumentalities of defense, against dangers from within and from without, the continued prosperity of our agricultural classes, and I assert that in the ratio of their prosperity are we, as a nation, bulwarked against danger. Make the farmer happy, cause his fields to yield an abundance sufficient for the needs of his own country and for the major supply of the world's needs and you have such a guaranty of peace as can not be furnished by standing armies and navies. America's agricultural prosperity means international peace. [Applause.]

The South has a special interest in this bill. More than 57 per cent of her 10,000,000 people employed in gainful occupations are directly engaged in agricultural operations and at least one-half of the remaining population trace their employment directly to the farm.

No territory of like dimension in all the world affords such limitless agricultural possibilities and to none is agriculture of such vast importance.

The dazzling, almost romantic growth of manufacturing in the South since 1880, when it had its real beginning, gives some justification for the idea that the South is forsaking its first and oldest love—agriculture—for this brilliant and newer courtier—manufacturing. The capital invested in farm property in these States is four times greater than that employed in manufacturing and the ratio of population engaged in the two occupations differs even more widely. Agriculture is and will continue to be the predominant occupation of the Southern people, even though our progress in manufacturing in the last thirty years and our natural advantages give a reasonable expectancy that the South is to become the center of this great industry, with respect to cotton manufacturing at least.

Fifty years ago the conservative thought of the country was settled in the conviction that the successful manufacture of raw cotton in the South was impossible. It was only the "irrational dreamer" who had the temerity to predict the day when the cotton mill would move to the cotton field, and I now put myself in that class by making bold to prophesy that the next fifty years will see the bulk of the cotton crop of this country made into the finished product in the South, and I am willing for our brief record in this new field and the logic of the situation speak for me.

According to Mr. R. H. Edmonds, editor of the Manufacturer's Record, the South from 1880 to 1905 increased the number of its spindles from 667,000 to 9,205,000, and its raw cotton consumption from 225,000 to 2,163,000 bales, only a little short of the consumption of the New England mills, and its capital invested from $21,000,000 to $220,000,000, while a Southern State, South Carolina, reached second place among the States of the Union in this industry. This is the record of less than one-third of a century, and it is unprecedented, unparalleled, unapproached in the history of this business. [Applause.]

This achievement, if it is indicative of anything, means that the South is not only to monopolize the production of raw cotton, but control its manufacture. In every essential of successful manufacture of cotton the South has the advantage over the New England States. Her labor is cheaper and as productive, her climate is less severe, while the number and magnitude of her water powers, with the proximity of her coal and iron deposits, give her a natural asset unequaled, not alone by New England, but by the world, and when to these are added the presence of the cotton field itself and her innumerable navigable streams, the cheapest mode of transportation, every possible advantage is hers in the struggle for supremacy in this great industry. These natural advantages, this sacred heritage, the reawakened energies and confident hopes of her people shall fashion into a wealth and happiness all their own. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, rich in industrial potentialities as is the South, she is vastly more rich in agricultural possibilities. To us, who are filled with enthusiasm for the future for this great occupation in this section, these possibilities seem unlimited. The imagination does not exist which can portray the agriculture of the South fifty years from to-day if the progress of the last few years is maintained. With her mild and evenly balanced climate, permitting outdoor labor at every season of the year, her fertile soil, capable of producing profitably every crop known to the Temperate and Semitorrid zones, with her abundant rainfall and her vast undeveloped area of farm lands, she possesses all the elements which must be present in the creation of a great agricultural empire. That she is to become such an empire is evidenced in her marvelous agricultural progress since the civil war, and in the confident, enthusiastic, and triumphant optimism of her agricultural classes.

It is impossible to form a clear conception of the progress of Southern agriculture or the dormant possibilities it holds for future development without the necessity of recalling the fearful devastation wrought to farm values by the bloodiest and the most unfortunate of the world's tragedies.

The total of farm values in the South in 1860 was $2,880,000,000, while for 1870 these values were only $1,648,000,000, or a decrease of 42.2 per cent in the brief period of ten years, the darkest that ever visited any section in the history of God's children. In the twinkling of an eye, for a decade is hardly that in the life of a nation, almost one-half of the accumulated earnings, the conservation of two centuries of genius and labor, was swallowed up in the terrible tempest of war and the more destructive saturnalia of maladministration and flagrant misrule.

During the same period the value of all Southern property showed a decrease of more than $2,000,000,000, almost one-half, and "through the death and permanent invalidism of at least 300,000 of the very pick and flower of its people," Mr. R. H. Edmonds, an undisputed authority, estimates an additional loss to this scourged section of $3,000,000,000 of wealth, "wealth far more real than coal and iron and timber, stocks and bonds, for men of character and energy, not natural resources, are the true wealth of a country," and I quote the same authority for the statement that, "2,500,000 Southern-born whites were forced by conditions more appalling than any nation in modern times ever faced, worse even than conditions that prevail in Russia," to emigrate to more inviting fields, and if the usual economic value of $10,000 for a man is allowed, we must charge to the insatiable appetite of war and reconstruction the consumption of $25,000,000,000 more of the real wealth of the South. The sum total of Southern loss in wealth in the actual depreciation in the values of property, in the death and emigration of its productive agencies, aggregates the stupendous sum of $30,000,000,000, $5,000,000,000 more than the total agricultural wealth of the whole country to-day, two and one-half times more than the capital invested in all the railroads of the country, more than three times that engaged in all the manufacturing establishments of the nation, and nearly one-third of the present total wealth of the United States. Appalling as are these facts, they fail to furnish a complete portrayal of the actual conditions.

A revolution as complete as ever blotted out a civilization or gave birth to a new dynasty was forced upon the South. That courageous, patient, conservative statesmanship which, for sixty out of seventy years, gave her an undisputed leadership in shaping the destiny of the nation was now denied the poor privilege of a voice in guiding her own, while 4,000,000 former slaves were turned loose upon her with every right of citizenship enjoyed by the white man, with none of his capacities for the right using of them.

Backed by Federal bayonets, urged on by misguided fanaticism, and aided in his deviltry by the carpetbagger and the more damnable scalawag, the unchained rapacity of the ignorant negro gorged itself upon the little property that remained to the South from the war's devastation. The brazen adventurer and the unshamed traitor enriched themselves at her expense, while to meet the demands of plunderers taxation was raised to the point of confiscation, justice was bartered as a commodity of commercial value, official place was bought and sold, vice sat upon the throne of virtue, ignorance wore the crown of intelligence, and the cloven feet of vandalism pressed upon the neck of patriotism.

The South was as one stupefied, groping in the dark, knowing not what the morrow would bring forth or what dread disaster might come through the night, while capital, coward as it always is, sought place of safety, investment, other fields of employment, and the wheels of progress stood still. There never was a darker day for the South, and never was there a blacker chapter added to the glorious record of our matchless national life, and I would, Mr. Chairman, that there was some power to blot it from our history and our memories, and I know that I but express the wish of every son whose brave father faced mine in the fierce fire of battle. [Applause.]

To this great section, nothing was saved from the terrible holocaust of war and reconstruction except those indestructible elements essential to all national greatness, the natural resources with which God had endowed it, and the grim determination, courage, and genius of its people. [Applause.]

In 1870 the seemingly dead body politic gave evidence of returning life. Oppression had gone too far, the Southern white man was aroused, and his capacity for rule, his hatred of tyrrany, his love for local self-government, asserted themselves, and in a peaceful revolution the reign of ignorance and corruption was overthrown and the Southern State governments were put back into the hands of the virtue and intelligence of their own people. [Applause.]

The hope that inspired this struggle and the courage which won this victory gave agriculture a new confidence and an assurance that investment and labor should find protection and reward under the law.

By 1880 the value of Southern property had reached $2,343,000,000, over $500,000,000 short of the farm values at the beginning of the war, and by 1890 Southern agriculture had fully reached the status it possessed in 1860.

In the brief space of a human life the sturdy Southern farmer—and man for man, opportunity for opportunity, he has no superior on earth—under unparalleled adverse conditions, in the teeth of hostile legislation, laboring under the burden of confiscatory taxation, handicapped by the process of transition from a state of measurable dependence upon the negro for support to a reliance upon his own brain and muscle, and in the face of criticism and prejudice, had laid for himself a foundation, not only equal to that upon which he stood thirty years before, but had laid it infinitely more broadly and deeply, in that it was predicated upon intelligent and productive as against ignorant and comparatively unproductive labor. [Applause.]

The so-called "Old South," and I say it with all deference to the sacredness and glory that term implies, industrially, was largely the product of a system of labor necessarily based upon a low order of intelligence, while the so-called "New South"—a misnomer which I spurn and despise—is to be what its white labor and intelligence make it.

But, Mr. Chairman, the past is history and memories; the future is opportunity.

And what boundless opportunities, what limitless possibilities are there in the varied agricultural resources of the South awaiting the touch of trained intellects and the application of scientific businesslike farm methods.

In the extent of its territory, the fertility of its soil, and the wonderful variety of its farm products the South verily is unapproached by any other section of this country or of the world, and in the possibilities it offers for ideal farm conditions it is likewise without rival.

The great staple money crop of the South is cotton, which in many respects is the world's greatest crop. The money value of it in 1907 approximates the enormous sum of $800,000,000. It furnishes 30 per cent of the total value of American exports and brings from Europe more than $400,000,000 annually—a princely tribute of over $1,000,000 each day of the year.

Has the South reached its maximum of cotton production? That is a question of gravest importance, alike to the South itself and to this country and the world. The pessimist, along with many conservative men, through a lack of understanding of the real conditions, sees in the enormous yield of the past few years the limit of development for this crop. This is not a new thought, for as early as 1823, when the total crop amounted to 509,600 bales of 300 pounds each, the statisticians of Liverpool proved to their own satisfaction that in consequence of the abolition of the slave trade the maximum production of cotton had then been reached. Another example of the fact that figures may lie. The truth is, this great industry is in the very infancy of its development. The Southern people are just learning how to grow cotton, how to market it, how to make it the regal crop its importance to the comfort and happiness of mankind entitle it to become.

In the last quarter of a century the number of acres planted has increased 100 per cent, bales produced 188 per cent, and the value of the crop more than 155 per cent—a growth which points to a continued development both in the magnitude and value of this imperial industry. It must be borne in mind also in this connection that the average yield per acre, about 210 pounds lint, is steadily increasing, although it is far from the maximum or even the yield of the more intelligently cultivated and improved farms of the Southern growers. The highest yield from 1 acre of which any record exists is 2,000 pounds lint, and two bales per acre is coming to be regarded as not an uncommon yield among the best farmers of the South.

The maximum of production will be reached only when the present average yield reaches the average yield of the more improved farm. That this result is to come is just as certain as intelligence, care, and improved methods always work revolutions upward. I confidently expect to see the South produce 30,000,000 bales of cotton per annum, with a value proportionately great. To do this there will be little increase in acreage and only the natural increase in labor supply will be necessary. The result is to be had by increasing the yield per acre, by the bringing of the average to the maximum, through improved farm methods, a more thorough understanding of seed selection, a greater knowledge of soil conditions and fertilizer problems, a more general appreciation of crop rotation and diversification, and the recognition of live stock as an indispensable factor in all successful agriculture. In every one of these essentials the South is undergoing a veritable revolution.

But, Mr. Chairman, will the world ever need 30,000,000 bales of cotton? The pessimist again says, "No." Optimist as I am I am just as emphatic in believing and asserting the contrary.

It is an economic principle that demand makes supply. In accordance with such a principle cotton production must go pari passu with the world's need for cotton. Fifty years ago the wants of the world were satisfied with 2,500,000 bales; today she demands the production of 20,000,000 bales, according to the Census Bureau, two-thirds of which must come from the South. In the last twenty years the consumption of cotton has nearly doubled, and if a proportionate increase in demand continues for a like period the South must produce 26,000,000 bales to meet it. Of the four great staples that provide man with clothing, cotton is the cheapest and comes nearest meeting the demands of every people and clime, and therefore the markets for cotton goods are steadily broadening, new markets opening up, new territory is being invaded, and new people converted to an appreciation of cotton as a clothing material. It is estimated that of the world's population of 1,500,000,000 only 500,000,000 wear clothes regularly, while 750,000,000 are only partly clothed and 250,000,000 live in comparative nakedness.

The great bulk of the unclothed and only partly clothed people of the world live in the torrid and semitorrid zones, for which cotton is the ideal clothing material. The advance in the civilization of these people means a demand for dress in accordance with the standards of civilization, for the clothing of a nation in a way measures its civilization. Statisticians agree that it will take 42,000,000 bales of cotton per year to clothe the human family in keeping with the average dress of its more advanced people. This marks the need of the world to-day for clothing, and the demand for it is just so sure to come as civilization is certain to advance. This is the South's field for conquest. [Applause.]

I trust, Mr. Chairman, it will not be considered out of place for me to correct the idea that the agriculture of the South must of necessity be confined to cotton growing, and that its soil and climatic conditions act as a bar to the successful growing of the other great staple crops of the country—wheat, oats, corn, hay, and cattle. Cotton will always be primary and predominant, but as secondary and defensive crops profit may be had in growing these other crops. That this is true is demonstrated by an examination of their history in the South during the last twenty-five years, and for this purpose I desire to submit a carefully prepared table showing the progress of wheat growing in the United States as compared to the Southern States, and of Minnesota and Kansas as compared to South Carolina.

It is seen that the acreage in wheat for the United States has increased 24.4 per cent, and for the Southern States there is a decrease of 14.7 per cent; for the United States there is an increase of 48.8 per cent in bushels produced and only 10 per cent for the Southern States, and an increase in yield per acre for the United States of 19.5 per cent and 28.9 per cent for the Southern States. The signficance of these figures is that while there has been an actual decrease in acreage and only 10 per cent increase in bushels produced for the Southern States, as compared to large increases in both of these directions for the United States, the Southern States, in production per acre, show much greater increase than is shown for the United States. In the essential of successful agriculture, increase in yield per acre, the South shows its greatest comparative progress, and this serves as the best evidence of what can be done.

In the comparison of South Carolina with Minnesota and Kansas the same significant fact stands out—a large increase, 29.9 per cent in production per acre, against a slight increase for Kansas and an actual decrease of 4 per cent for Minnesota. The logic of these figures is that if Minnesota continues to decrease in yield per acre, while South Carolina continues to increase in the same ratio as in the period covered, the time is not distant when the production per acre in South Carolina will equal that of Minnesota and Kansas. But these facts fail to do full justice to the possibilities for wheat growing in the South, for, while her average production per acre is only 10.2 bushels, it is a fact known of all men that under proper methods of preparation and cultivation from 25 to 40 bushels can easily be grown in any of the Southern States. It is only a question of raising the average in the direction of the maximum yield, and this is to come as the result of the revolution going on in general agriculture in the South. What is true of wheat is likewise true of oats and corn, as the following tables will show:

Here, again, we find that the percentage of increase in yield per acre, both in oats and corn, is greatly in favor of the Southern States as against that of the United States, the actual percentages being 74.3 per cent for the one, against 14.6 per cent for the other. The great State of Illinois, a typical oat-growing State, shows an actual decrease of 16.9 per cent in yield per acre, while in South Carolina, where this crop is of only secondary consideration, there is an increase of 48.7 per cent in yield per acre. What is true of Illinois with respect to oats is also true of Iowa with respect to corn, which shows an increase in yield per acre of only 15.7 per cent, as against an increase of 36.1 per cent for South Carolina. It is true that the production in bushels in oats and corn in Illinois and Iowa is, respectively, much greater than it is in South Carolina, but the thoughtful man must not lose sight of the fact that in the criterion of real progress South Carolina has greatly outstripped both of these States.

But, again, I wish to call the attention of the House to the difference in average and maximum yield in oats for South Carolina, because it is the maximum in everything that inspires progress. The average yield in oats in South Carolina according to the figures is only 18.3 bushels, but in 1882 Col. J. D. Wylie had a yield of 182 bushels from one acre, and last year Mr. E. C. Haynesworth, a most reliable and intelligent gentleman of my district, got a yield of 80 bushels. This does not argue that these great records can ever be made averages, but they do justify the conclusion that under proper methods the average yield may be greatly raised. South Carolina holds the world's record for the greatest yield per acre, 254 bushels and 1 peck, for corn—a record made in 1889 in a world's competitive contest in which nearly every State in the Union participated [applause], and a yield of from 50 to 75 bushels per acre is becoming common among the best farmers of South Carolina. What is true of this State can be said of all the Southern States.

Agricultural scientists agree that the true basis of agriculture is live stock. Can the South raise cattle? The answer is, Can she raise hay, can she grow forage crops? Alfalfa is the main reliance of the Western live-stock industry, but the birthplace of American alfalfa is in Anderson County, S. C., where a plat has been in growth since 1835. So certain is the Department of Agriculture that alfalfa can be grown with great profit and success in the South that great efforts are being made for its general introduction into that section with results gratifying beyond expectation. The gentleman who owns the plat above referred to writes that he "frequently cuts as much as 6,000 pounds per acre in the first and second crops" while an Alabama grower had a net return per acre of $42 from three cuttings of alfalfa last year, and Doctor Ramseur, of my State, from what the Department of Agriculture terms a "model Southern hay farm," had a yield which netted him $60 per acre. But the hay crop of the South is by no means dependent upon the success of the efforts to introduce alfalfa. Her climate and soil make her the natural home of bermuda, the cowpea, and it is our most valuable forage crop, the clovers, and vetches of all kinds, and, in fact, every forage crop which has its habitat in the temperate zones.

These are the natural conditions. Are they not suggestive of a great cattle-growing section? No section of our country can show a more inviting prospect for this great industry. All that is necessary is to have our people go into the business, to lift the quarantine against Southern cattle, and to have the Department of Agriculture continue its great work of teaching the Southern dairyman the best methods, increasing as it had done in the work of the past two years the yield per head of dairy cattle $3.75 per month, and the cattle industry will take its proper place in the agriculture of the South.

The trite saying among my people is that "he who raises his own hog and hominy not only controls the price of his cotton, but makes himself independent." Can the South raise hogs? The Department of Agriculture says that "the Southern States can produce corn almost as cheaply as the most favored sections of Illinois and Missouri, while the great variety of fruit crops, the more nearly continuous grazing and the consequent greater immunity from disease give special advantages for profitable pork raising which do not exist elsewhere," and the same bulletin declares that the South should lead in pork raising, while enterprising farmers have proven the same thing over and over again.

Mr. Chairman, I have said somewhere in these remarks that the South is or will be the home of the small farmer, the man of average means, of limited capital. I undertake to prove it by two tables showing the comparative possible net returns of an improved farm in South Carolina and one in Iowa, which I submit:

Value of products of an improved farm in South Carolina.

[Values figured on prices of December 1, 1907.]

12 acres—12 450-pound bales cotton, 5,400 pounds, at 10 cents	$540.00
360 bushels cotton seed, at 20 cents	72.00
12 acres—420 bushels corn, at 78 cents per bushel (35 bushels per acre)	327.60
7 acres—280 bushels oats, at 72 cents per bushel (40 bushels per acre)	201.60
5 acres—125 bushels wheat, at $1.20 per bushel (25 bushels per acre)	150.00
(12 acres following oats and wheat crops, 7 and 5) 12 tons hay, at $16.50 per ton (1 ton per acre)	198.00
36	1,489.20
Deduct fertilizer	175.00
Balance	1,314.20
Average per acre	35.52
Present income of average South Carolina farm	410.00
Average per acre	11.00

Value of products of an improved farm in Iowa.

[Values figured on prices of December 1, 1907.]

80 acres—2,800 bushels corn, at 43 cents per bushel (35 bushels per acre)	$1,204.00
25 acres—1,000 bushels oats, at 38 cents per bushel (40 bushels per acre)	380.00
10 acres—250 bushels wheat, at 82 cents per bushel (25 bushels per acre)	205.00
15 acres—15 tons hay, at $8 per ton (1 ton per acre)	120.00
130	1,909.00
Average per acre	14.67
Present income per average farm in Iowa	1,597.00
Average per acre	12.20

The average South Carolina farm of 90 acres, 37 improved, under present methods yields an income of $410—$11 per acre—while under improved methods the same acreage will show a money value of $1,314.20—$35.52 per acre. The average Iowa farm of 151 acres, 130 improved, gives a value of $1,597, or $12.20 per acre, as against an income of $1,909—$14.67 per acre—for an improved farm. It is thus seen that 37 acres in South Carolina produce an income of $1,314, while it takes 130 acres in Iowa to produce $1,909; or, in other words, the yield per acre in South Carolina is more than two and one-half times that of Iowa, and this means that if the average farm of South Carolina contained an acreage of improved land equal to that of the average Iowa farm the income from it would be $4,617.60, compared to $1,909 for Iowa—142 per cent in favor of the South Carolina farm. If we add only 16 acres to the improved land of the average farm of South Carolina we shall have a farm which will bring a profit equal to that of 130 acres, the improved land of the average farm of Iowa. Another point to be considered in this connection is—and it bears out my suggestion that the South offers an unequaled field for the small farmer—that $1,800 will purchase the average farm, 90 acres, in South Carolina, while the average farm of Iowa—151 acres, at $75 per acre—will cost $11,325, a consideration of vast importance to the investor in farm lands.

And, on an $1,800 investment the Carolina farm pays an annual dividend of 73 per cent, as against a 17 per cent dividend on the Iowa investment of $11,325, an actual difference of 56 per cent in favor of the Carolina land. But for fear that we have not done full justice to the productiveness of the Iowa farm we shall quadruple its yield per acre for the various products, making each acre of corn yield 140 bushels; oats, 160; wheat, 100, and hay, 4 tons, and still the per cent of profit for the Iowa farm is 68 per cent as against 73 per cent; while if the same process were applied to South Carolina, the dividend would amount to 292 per cent.

These figures are interesting and valuable not so much as a comparison, but as showing beyond a question, acre for acre under like methods, a capability of productiveness of Southern lands absolutely unapproached by any other section of the country, and in addition to this they show almost boundless opportunities for the farmer of small capital. Two hundred and six million acres classified as unimproved farm lands and millions of acres of unclassified land in the South await the elixir of man's intelligence to lay at his feet their immeasurably rich treasures. [Applause.]

Time does not permit a comprehensive enumeration of the South's enormous possibilities for fruit and truck growing. It is sufficient to say that in the last six years wonderful strides have been made in these lines, and that to the man of care and intelligence they have brought stupenduous returns. This industry is in its infancy and is most inviting.

Such, Mr. Chairman, are our possibilities, such are our opportunities, such is the record we have made, and to-day we stand upon the threshold of a great future, the greater triumphs lie before us. Nature has smiled upon this fair land, and the smile has brought joy to the hearts of its people and strength to their arm. The celebrated poet, Emerson, said, "America is another name for opportunity," and that unique character, Greeley, enjoined, "Young man, go West and grow up with the country," but if the great poet and the great philosopher and editor could see the South as she is to-day, with her snowy fields of cotton, her mountains of minerals, her vast forest areas, her rich granite beds, her coal and iron deposits, her fertile plains and unequaled climate, her long seacoast indented with incomparable harbors, her rivers lacing her like ribbons of silver, and her reawakened, confident, and conquering people, the conclusion of the one would be, "The South is another name for opportunity" [applause], and the injunction of the other, "Young man, go South and grow up with the country." [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, we read in Holy Writ of a—> good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat and barley and vines and fig trees and pomegranates; a land of olive oil and honey; a land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack anything in it; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass.

And to me it reads like an inspired description of the South fronting the future, confident, buoyant, thrilled by an all-pervading spirit of progress. [Loud applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask how much time the gentleman from South Carolina has left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has occupied fifty-six minutes.

Mr. REID. How much time would he have remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, having introduced a bill for the restoration of the duty on manganese iron ore, I will ask the indulgence of the honorable Members of this House for a short time and read the bill. It is as follows:

> A bill (H. R. 19365) to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the mining and shipping of manganese iron ore in the United States.
> Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of May, 1908, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all manganese ore imported from foreign countries the sum of 40 cents per gross ton of 2,240 pounds.

The schedule of 40 cents per ton duty was in force on foreign importations of manganese and all other iron ore prior to July, 1897, and was effective for years and is still in effect on all other iron ores, except manganese ore.

At the special session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, after the Senate had passed the bill introduced by Senator BACON, of Georgia, to increase the duty on manganese ore from 40 cents to $1 per ton for the protection of American producers and American labor, the wage being four times greater paid than the extraordinary cheap pauper labor in Russia, Chile, Brazil, Japan, and Cuba for mining manganese ore, and in addition to this competition a minimum ballast rate from Odessa, Russia, Brazil, Chile, and Cuban ports was and is now being made to New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, which, even before the duty was taken off by the Republican conferees of the House of Representatives and the Senate, the competition hereinbefore named made it difficult to compete in the open market with foreign producers.

The conferees from the House of Representatives was composed of the honorables Mr. Dingley, Mr. PAYNE, Mr. DALZELL, Mr. HOPKINS, Mr. Grosvenor, Mr. BAILEY, Mr. McMillan, and Mr. White of Alabama.

The majority of the conferees of this committee were, then and now, pronounced protectionists; notwithstanding this fact, emphasized, they caused the conferees of the Senate, the honorables Mr. ALLISON, Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. Platt of Connecticut, Mr. BURROWS, Mr. Jones of Arkansas, Mr. Jones of Nevada, Mr. White, and Mr. Vest, to agree in conference to a free duty on manganese ore, effective July, 1897, and since that time almost the entire consumption of manganese ore for making spiegeleisen by the steel mills of the United States—and without the mixture of spiegeleisen steel products of every description can not be made—has been imported free of duty from foreign countries, thereby resulting in great loss to the United States Government, for a duty on 207,068 tons (of 2,240 pounds) of manganese ore received at the different ports of entry in the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, as shown by the statement furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury at my request.

Therefore by placing manganese ore on the free list at the time hereinbefore stated in a great measure totally destroyed the output of mining and shipping manganese ore for steel-making purposes in the following States:

> Colorado, Arkansas, California, Georgia, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia.

The following extracts from the debate in the United States Senate, taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 3, 1897, upon placing manganese ore on the free list, is respectfully submitted:

> Mr. BACON. I did not hear the Senator from Iowa with respect to the amendment which he suggested relative to manganese ore.
>
> Mr. ALLISON. It was simply to put on the free list manganese ore not otherwise provided for. There is a duty upon manganese ore.
>
> Mr. BACON. I simply desire to say that according to the best information I can get from those familiar with the subject that is an amendment the practical effect of which is to put all manganese ore on the free list. That is the assurance given to me by those who are interested in it and who have knowledge of all the features of this particular ore. I am quite sure the Senator can get that information if those are appealed to who have the requisite knowledge.
>
> Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that it is not our purpose to put manganese ore on the free list. I think very likely the amendment as it stands now will have the effect to put most of it on the free list, but I hope that it will be changed later on.
>
> Mr. BACON. I desire to state, in this connection, that I occupy the same position in reference to that particular raw material that I do in reference to all others. I think the putting of raw materials produced in this country, which are to be used by manufacturers, upon the free list is the most odious and unjust form of protection which can be devised. My information is that that will be the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. I am opposed to protection based upon the protective principle, and I am opposed to free raw materials because I am opposed to protection.
>
> I believe in revenue duties, and I believe in those revenue duties being impartially imposed. I think the question is not one between free trade and tariff duties. I think we are compelled to have a tariff, and that the question is really one which relates to what is a proper tariff and what is an improper tariff, and not a question as between free trade and tariff duties. I think a tariff which puts upon the free list raw material produced in this country is an improper tariff, one in which there is an improper discrimination, one in which the legitimate and necessary effect is protection, I repeat, of the rankest, most offensive, and most unjust form. Ordinary protection is given to the manufacturer at the expense of the great mass of consumers. But free raw materials for the manufacturer is none the less protection, but it is protection to the manufacturer at the expense of the producer of the raw material.
>
> Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa says he anticipates that this may be changed, and consequently what I say now I suggest simply because I will not have an opportunity to be heard before the tribunal by which it is proposed to be changed.
>
> Mr. TELLER. I can see no reason why manganese should be put on the free list any more than iron ore or coal or various other articles. If the committee intend to do that—I have rather understood they did not—they ought to give some reason for it. The Senator says he hopes it will be arranged later. If that means in conference, it is a very unsatisfactory disposition of the case, it seems to me. We have practically no control over it, and while we do not want to be put in a position of making unnecessary delay and contesting all these questions, it seems to me we had better fix it right here. If the committee do not mean to put manganese of all kinds on the free list, let them specify what kind they do want to put on.
> Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa how there can be a conference on the question of manganese when the House put it on the free list and it is retained in the free list by the Senate. I do not see how there can be any question in conference. If the bill passes the Senate with manganese on the free list, it looks to me that will be the end of it.

Mr. ALLISON. By an amendment the other day we placed a duty of $1 a ton upon all manganese ore containing less than 40 metallic units, and then we put manganese ore not specially provided for on the free list, so that the whole question is open for conference.

The Senator from Colorado says, Why not fix it here instead of waiting for the conference? I think myself that the metallic unit should be 50 instead of 40, but I do not know.

Mr. TELLER. I do not.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not supposed to know to a certainty. We did the best we could after consulting the people respecting it. As the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] very well says to me, we have telegraphed for information from other people. We will have the whole matter in conference, to be justly dealt with, as we intend to deal with it. If Senators want to have it disposed of now, they can dispose of it, of course.

Mr. BACON. Manganese is found in a very few localities in the United States. It is in Georgia, Alabama, Virginia, and Arkansas, and possibly there is some in North Carolina.

Mr. TELLER. Colorado.

Mr. BACON. And Colorado also, the Senator from Colorado states. I was not aware of that fact.

As I understand, it is used in the manufacture of all steel. Why there should be any disposition on the part of those who are in charge of the bill in any degree to take from this material that which is so freely and liberally granted in all other directions, I am unable to say or divine.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I was in favor of a duty on manganese ore. The House put it on the free list. The Senate then put $1 a ton on manganese ore. Then it was represented to the committee that to change it so that manganese ore containing less than 50 metallic units would operate practically to put a duty upon all the ore which really came in competition with American ore. The committee accepted that theory of it and were about to change it in that way. Then we were persuaded to reduce it to 40, and that is the way it stands now.

I think perhaps a mistake has been made. I should like to go back to $1 a ton on manganese ore, but we are necessarily compelled now to seek accurate information, which we have not at the present time.

Mr. BACON. I trust the Senator will secure it. I have been assured within the past twenty-four hours by a gentleman who professes to know all about this subject, and who is very largely interested, that the practical effect of the proposed amendment is to put it upon the free list.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am afraid it is.

Mr. BACON. Senators suggest that they have not information to enable them to act upon the matter at this time, and it will have to go before the conference committee, at which time and place, I am sorry to say, I will not be in a position to be heard. Of course we can, as suggested, offer a subsequent amendment.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator from Iowa to say that he is consulting in regard to the matter and expects to change it before the bill passes the Senate, not waiting until it goes into conference. Is that correct?

Mr. ALLISON. I can say that it will be impossible to agree with everything and everybody on this bill before it reaches conference. I did say to the Senator from Georgia that I hoped we might arrange it before the bill finally passed the Senate, and I do, but of course it can not be arranged at this moment; and the amendment I offered a moment ago was to make it absolutely certain that the whole question would go into conference. If Senators wish to dispose of it now or at any time, the bill is open to amendment, and they can propose any amendment they choose. The committee is trying to do the best it can about the matter, and will endeavor to treat it fairly. That is all I have to say.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to make a suggestion in furtherance of the desire expressed by himself? If this amendment is not put upon the committee amendment previously adopted, the whole matter will go into conference, because as it came from the House manganese was on the free list. If the Senate puts it on the taxed list, of course the whole subject is open for the action of the conference. But, on the contrary, if the Senate, by the present amendment, puts it back on the free list, will the subject be any further open to conference between the two Houses? If I am in order, I will make the motion. I have not the paragraph before me, and I can not tell exactly what the phraseology should be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is on page 175.

Mr. BACON. I will move that the paragraph be so amended as to put manganese ore on the tax list at a dollar a ton.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending, the amendment of the committee, on page 169, paragraph 505. Will the Senator from Iowa permit that to be withdrawn temporarily, that the motion of the Senator from Georgia may be entertained?

Mr. QUAY. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will not be withdrawn. The manganese ore is ore which enters into the manufacture of iron and steel, and in the use of which and duty upon which every producer of iron and steel in this country is interested. The manganese of the grade necessary to produce the higher grades of iron and steel is not found in this country except in very small quantities.

I believe there is manganese in Georgia; there is manganese in Arkansas; there is manganese in Virginia, and there is a large quantity of manganese in Colorado, it is said, but it is of low grade. The Colorado manganese is in the form of manganiferous ore, containing, I think, only 23 per cent of manganese.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. QUAY. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. We have been shipping quite large quantities from Colorado to the Illinois Steel Company.

Mr. QUAY. I understand that last year Colorado shipped 13,000 tons to the Illinois Steel Company of this low-grade manganese ore, which is called "manganiferous ore," and the duty upon it is provided, as the Senator from Colorado will find, in paragraph 118, in connection with iron ore. It is used in the manufacture of steel rails. The first product procured from it is not ferromanganese, the product of the higher grade of manganese ore, but spiegeleisen, out of which steel rails are made. The effect simply of the imposition of a duty upon this manganese would be to impose a revenue duty to that extent upon all of the manganese imported from abroad. It would not, I think, benefit the Senator from Georgia, and certainly not the Senator from Colorado, a cent. If the duty is to be imposed upon the raw material, of course it follows that the duty must go upon ferromanganese, which is the product.

I have a paper here upon manganese. I have not devoted much attention to this subject, but I have just been glancing over the paper handed to me giving the statistics of the manganese ore, which I send to the desk to have read. I trust the amendment offered on behalf of the committee will be adopted.

Mr. BACON. Upon the assurance given by Senators that they consider that this amendment does not cut off any part of the consideration by the conference committee, but that the whole subject will be open, I am willing to withdraw the amendment, because at last it is to rest with the conference committee.

Mr. QUAY. I should be glad to have the paper which I sent to the desk read or go into the RECORD anyhow. I want it to go before the conference committee. As a matter of course, the entire subject will be before the conference committee, and I hope the conferees will adhere to the determination of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I will simply state in this connection, as we will not have an opportunity to be heard before the conferees, that the freight upon manganese ore from the point of mining to the mills where the steel is made exceeds the cost of water transportation on similar ore of either a higher or lower grade brought from other countries to the mills for the same purpose. There is a very large amount of it, I understand, in Central America close to water transportation. Upon the assurance that the Senate conferees will have the entire subject-matter open and that the amendment proposed by the committee will not cut off any part of it, I will withdraw the amendment which I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The Chair understands that the Senator from Georgia withdraws his amendment.

Mr. QUAY. Let the paper I sent to the desk be read. I prefer to put it in the RECORD in that form.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be printed without being read.

Mr. QUAY. I will agree that it shall be printed without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the paper will be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The paper referred to is as follows:

MANGANESE ORES.

Manganese ore bears the same relation to the metal manganese as iron ore does to the metal iron, or lead ore to lead, and in commerce runs from 45 to 55 per cent manganese, and must be low enough in phosphorus to make a metal that shall not contain on an average twenty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent phosphorus. All manganese ores contain more or less of iron.

Manganiferous ore is an iron ore containing from 3 to 20 per cent of manganese. The higher grade is foreign and supply limited. Colorado is producing some 28 per cent manganese ore. The prominent supply in this country is from the Lake Superior region, and contains from 3 to 8 per cent of manganese.

USES.

Manganese ore is used to make ferromanganese, which contains—

	Per cent.
Manganese	80
Iron	12
Carbon	8
Total	100

Manganiferous ores are used to make spiegeleisen, which is ordinarily of two grades—one containing 10 per cent manganese, the other 20 per cent manganese, the remaining percentage being iron with carbon, etc. About twenty-five one-hundredths of a ton of manganese ores is used with the manganiferous ores to produce a ton of spiegeleisen to get the proper grade.

Ferromanganese (metal) is used in the manufacture of steel, principally in low-carbon steel. The manganese is to remove the oxide of iron in melted steel, and the carbon to add the percentage necessary.

Spiegeleisen (metal) is used for high-carbon steel, like steel rails, permitting of adding more carbon without increasing the manganese.

SUPPLY OF MANGANESE ORES.

About 9 per cent of the supply was imported in 1894 and 1895 and 95 per cent will be imported in 1897.

The importations are as follows:

Year.	Gross tons.	Value.
1894	71,400	$534,000
1895	66,600	545,000
1896	60,000	567,487
1897 (estimated)	120,000	1,250,000

The home production has been as follows:

Year.	Gross tons.	Value.
1894	6,308	$53,635
1895	9,547	71,769
1896	7,000	50,000
1897	(a)	(a)

[a] Will not exceed 1896.

In 1893 the production was 7,718 tons.

SEARCH FOR MANGANESE ORES.

The manufacturers of steel in this country have searched in every State for manganese ore, and since the Crimora mine in Virginia closed in 1892, no other deposit of any size of merchantable ore has been found. Large sums of money are being spent annually in such search, and, as an extra inducement to development, a higher price is offered and paid for domestic ores than for the foreign ores. In this country the deposits are all in pockets of small and uncertain size, particularly in Arkansas and Virginia. The former ore is too high in phosphorous to work alone, and low phosphorous ores must be imported to mix with it. Likewise the bulk of the Virginia deposits are useless on account of containing too much phosphorous.

COLORADO.

It has been stated that Colorado could produce almost sufficient manganese ore to supply this country. This is erroneous, as Colorado produces no manganese ore, or practically none, the product being a manganiferous iron ore containing 22 to 28 per cent manganese, and is used in the manufacture of spiegeleisen containing 20 per cent manganese, and principally at the works of the Illinois Steel Company, for which purpose they are using it at the present time. Colorado produced 13,464 tons of such ore in 1896, which would make about 18,000 tons of spiegel, while the requirement for spiegel in 1896 was about 85,000 tons, and this is outside of the use of ferromanganese, which requires high-grade imported manganese ores, containing 45 to 55 per cent manganese.

Mr. Chairman, the Republican party in its national platform for the past forty-five years has proclaimed the doctrine of the protective-tariff principle for American labor and capital against the pauper labor and cunning capital of foreign monarchy.

From the great Morrill tariff bill to the Dingley bill, in a measure, the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States have protected the American miner, laborer, and manufacturer of raw material of iron ore, steel, coal, coke, gold, copper, lead, zinc, lumber, and a thousand other things originally produced in the United States.

Why Congress should discriminate against manganese ore that must be used in the manufacture of steel rails and all other steel structural formations and put it on the free list is a glaring inconsistency and smacks strongly of special legislation for special manufacturers.

If iron ore is favored by a high protective tax and 35,000,000 tons were mined and shipped in the United States during the year of 1907 to exclude foreign competition, it is certainly reasonable that 40 cents or even $1 per ton as a duty passed by the Senate should be placed on the peculiar metal, manganese, that is absolutely necessary to make a durable and perfect steel rail, as well as all other manufactured steel products, owing to the fact that manganese gives iron a greater tensile strength, elasticity, and elongation.

Mr. Chairman, when wealthy American manufacturers import free pauper labor and free cheap ore they are indirectly cutting their own throats at the temporary saving of a few dollars and heaping hot coals on the heads of intelligent American miners, not only in Colorado but in many other States of the Union.

Before manganese ore was placed on the free list by the conferees of the House I was the largest shipper of manganese ore in the United States; have shipped from Leadville, Colo., more than 125,000 tons of manganese ore for steel manufacturing purposes, mined by American labor, the wage paid being $3 per day for miners and $4 per day for engineers and pump men, precisely the same wage as paid by mine operators in Colorado for mining gold, silver, lead, and copper bearing ores, in competition with a wage of 60 to 75 cents per day paid for mining manganese ore in Russia, Chile, Brazil, Japan, and Cuba, to the absolute injury of intelligent American labor. From these countries the supply is now coming in ballast to the United States and used by all of the steel mills in our country, except the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, of Pueblo, Colo. (the only steel works west of Chicago), and since the establishment of the Colorado Steel Works in 1880 (twenty-eight years) have used more than 500,000 tons of Leadville manganese ore for making spiegeleisen, the mixture with pig iron, for reasons hereinbefore stated, mixed in converting furnaces producing steel ingots from which merchantable steel is rolled into shape.

Mr. Chairman, millions of tons of iron (hematite) ore in the Mesaba, Goegebec, and Menominee ranges of Michigan and Minnesota are mined in open cuts with steam shovels, and placed on cars at cost of 26¼ cents per ton; this ore is protected by duty, as it should be.

The average cost for mining manganese ore and putting on cars at Leadville, Colo., is $2.77 per ton, and mined at depths of 300 to 640 feet from surface, and through verticle shafts, with long distance underground for miners to push tram cars to the station level.

The cost of mining and washing manganese ore in the States of Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, Georgia, and Arkansas has been $5 per ton, owing to the washing process required to make the ore marketable.

I take from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 3, 1897, the debate for placing manganese ore on the free list:

Mr. QUAY. There is manganese in Georgia, there is manganese in Arkansas, there is manganese in Virginia, and there is a large quantity of manganese in Colorado, it is said, but it is of low grade.

The Colorado manganese is in the form of manganiferous ore, containing, I think, only 23 per cent of manganese.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. QUAY. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. We have been shipping large quantities of manganese ore from Colorado to the Illinois Steel Company, Chicago.

Mr. QUAY. I understand that last year Colorado shipped 13,000 tons to the Illinois Steel Company of this low-grade manganese ore, which is called manganiferous ore, and the duty upon it is provided as the Senator from Colorado will find in paragraph 118 in connection with iron ore.

It so happened, Mr. Chairman, I was the shipper of the 13,000 tons of manganese ore to the Illinois Steel Company, Chicago, from Leadville.

I regret Senator Quay was given incorrect information as to the per cent of manganese "being 23 per cent," while in fact the per cent was 30 manganese and 18 per cent of iron in combination, and the contract price, based on these figures and settlements paid for accordingly and shipped and paid for as manganese ore, per contract.

Now, Mr. Chairman, any practical chemist or metallurgist in the United States will say manganese does not exist in its pure state in any part of the world, where deposits are known to exist, but metallic iron is found invariably in combination with the manganese, which is manganiferous iron ore, the 207,068 tons of manganiferous iron ore that was received for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, at the following customs districts, as furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury:

	Tons.	Value.
Baltimore	111,546	$766,512
Boston and Charlestown	2	73
Newark, N. J	117	1,322
New York	7,349	149,953
Philadelphia	87,008	730,625
New Orleans	475	4,043
San Francisco	53	2,424
Chicago	355	15,473
Cincinnati	73	2,229
Total	207,068	1,672,654

Should have paid a duty to the Government of 40 cents per ton, or the sum of $82,800 for the year, for the good and sufficient reason each and every ton of this foreign ore was manganiferous iron ore, but a Department ruling by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, W. B. Howell, delegated within himself the powers only granted under the law to the Congress of the United States, the Treasury Department has, and still maintains, this manifestly unfair ruling, resulting in great loss of revenue to the Government, as hereinbefore stated.

March 1, 2, 3, 1898, I personally appealed to the Board of General Appraisers, New York, furnishing Col. George C. Tichenor, president of the Board, with analysis of foreign "manganese" ore from samples of ore taken while unloading cargoes at the ports of New York and Baltimore, showing conclusively the ore was manganiferous, containing manganese and iron in combination. After making this showing of facts to President Tichenor on March 4, 1898, he recommended to Assistant Secretary W. B. Howell, of the Treasury, instructions be given collectors of customs to assess the duty at 40 cents per ton, prescribed in schedule "C" on all ore containing metallic iron and manganese in combination without regard to the percentage or invoice designation, whether as iron-ore manganese, manganiferous, or oxide of manganese or otherwise.

On March 10, 1898, after several personal interviews in this city with officials of the Treasury Department, I wrote Hon. W. B. Howell, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, as follows:

I beg to call your attention to my conversation of Tuesday last, and referring to letter to you from Senator Wolcott, under date March 2, your reply, dated March 5, as follows:

"I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 2d instant, in which you request to be advised as to the Department's definition of the term "manganese ore," the Department decided that manganiferous ores, to be entitled to free entry as manganese ore under the provision therefor in the free list of the tariff act then in force, must contain 50 per cent or over of manganese in quantity and not over 10 per cent of iron.

"This rule was laid down for the general guidance of custom officers, but in some cases, when the percentage of manganese was slightly less than 50 per cent, say, from 40 to 44 per cent, importations were admitted free as manganese ore when valuable only for the manganese contained therein.

"W. B. HOWELL,
"Assistant Secretary."

As the producers of manganese ore in the States of Colorado, Georgia, Arkansas, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia, we understand the free list is only to apply on straight manganese ore (if obtainable) or, to be explicit, manganese ore carrying no metallic iron. These two metals in combination, being manganiferous iron ore, therefore should pay duty of 40 cents per ton, etc.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is quite noticeable the Treasury Department changed their ruling to admit the ore free of duty as the character of ore changed in per cent of metallic contents. The facts are, of the 207,068 tons arriving for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, over 190,000 tons analyzed much less than 50 per cent manganese, and each and every ton carried metallic iron in combination, or, to be specific, manganiferous iron ore, by departmental ruling, in violation of the law, has passed free of duty for nearly eleven years; an unusual usurpation of pretended authority and manifestly unfair discrimination against (at that time) a growing industry in the States named.

The result, Mr. Chairman, has been to destroy almost entirely the mining and shipping of manganese (manganiferous iron ore) in the United States.

Representatives of certain interests will tell you there is no manganese (manganiferous) ore in the United States. Leadville, Colo., has since 1879—twenty-nine years—mined and shipped over 2,400,000 tons. Of this enormous tonnage 670,000 tons were shipped to the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company Steel Works, Pueblo, Colo., and the Illinois Steel Company, Chicago, for steel manufactured products; the remaining 1,730,000 tons to the Colorado Smelters for the fluxing and separation of silver, lead, gold, and other valuable ores, a charge of 30 per cent of iron being required for each and every mixture charge in the blast furnaces at these smelters.

I quote these figures of output of Colorado manganese ore to show the great injustice done by the governmental Bureau of Statistics, and quote from their figures, as given in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 3, 1897, the tonnage of manganese ore produced in the years of 1893, 1894, and 1895, in the States of Arkansas, California, Georgia, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and West Virginia, a total of 23,573 tons, while the tonnage of manganese ore produced in Colorado is left out entirely, which amounted to the large tonnage of 219,445 tons for the years 1893, 1894, and 1895.

The Bureau of Statistics figures, absolutely unreliable, was done for the specific purpose of misleading unknowing Members of the Fifty-fifth Congress, or part of the programme of the secret alliance formed in the House and Senate, through misrepresentations or misapprehension. There was but little manganese ore in the United States; therefore the scheme to place manganese ore on the free list was by unfair methods accomplished, which has resulted in a loss of revenue to the Government since 1897 of nearly $1,000,000.

The conferees of the House, in their great haste to place manganese ore (which, as hereinbefore stated, does not exist except in name), through their inexperience as practical chemists, metallurgists, or manufacturers of steel products, should have been requested and also had stipulated "manganiferous iron ore" (manganese and metallic iron in combination) be placed on the free list, and the alliance would then have accomplished the purpose they originally started out to do. Notwithstanding the daily pledge then and now made by the majority of the conferees of the House of Representatives, they at all times stood for the protection of American industries and American labor.

In the presentation of these indisputable facts of the great injustice by the conferees of the House of the Fifty-fifth Congress, your favorable consideration and cooperation is earnestly requested to restore the duty on manganese ore, thereby carrying out the protective principles and pledges of the Republican party, in the interests of American capital and labor. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I will send to the desk and ask that the Clerk read a resolution, and at a later date I will ask that the matter be heard before this House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. COOK] offers a resolution, which the Clerk will read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to send to the House of Representatives full information by what authority of law 207,068 tons of "manganese" ore (or manganiferous iron ore) were admitted free of duty at the ports of entry, New York, Baltimore, Boston, Newark, N. J., Philadelphia, New Orleans, San Francisco, Chicago, and Cincinnati for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907.

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Arkansas rise?

Mr. REID. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] reserved the balance of his time, which was four minutes, and yielded that much time to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the remarks of the able chairman of the Committee on Agriculture relating to the extension of the forest surveys of the country, and I had intended to discuss that subject at some little length if I could secure the time, but, not being able to do so, I now ask the unanimous consent of the committee, at the expiration of the time allotted to me, to extend my remarks upon the subject in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. REID] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, in the last few months, by the proclamation of the President, there has been withdrawn from the public domain in the State of Arkansas something like 2,000,000 acres of land, which have been set apart as forest reserves. This, it will be noticed, is an area almost as great as the combined acreage of the two States of Rhode Island and Delaware. It is two-thirds as large as Connecticut and nearly half as large as New Jersey. It brings the aggregate area of the national forest reserves up to the dignity of a territorial domain greater than all New England and the State of New York combined. Parallel with the expanding area of the national forest reserves is also the steadily increasing importance of the Forestry Service and the broadening application of the policies they have inaugurated. From the proposition to set aside a few areas on account of the peculiar conditions that existed we have advanced to an entirely new policy with reference to the public domain, at least so far as the country is concerned. In many respects it is an extreme departure from the idea that we have for long years entertained in regard to the power and purposes of the Federal Government in the disposition of the public lands.

I deem it, Mr. Chairman, as highly important that we should examine carefully the scope and purpose of this new movement and test it by the principle which constitutes the framework of our Government before proceeding so far that mistakes can not be remedied. Arguments that our forests may be made a source of great revenue are alluring, but ours is not a monarchial government. Our domain is not held as a source of profit to the State, but that it might become homes for the American people and that every citizen might select where he pleased. Arguments that it is not intended to interfere with the homesteader may tend to popularize the movement, but a careful examination will disclose that the services can not be properly administered and its avowed purposes accomplished consistent with a liberal construction of the homestead law. The establishment of the homestead law within the reserve must be consistent with the purposes of the reserve. We had as well meet the matter fairly. If we establish the policy we must recognize it as a long step toward eradication of the homestead laws. If this is to be done, and surely something must be done to conserve the timber resources of the country and in the interest of navigation, what are the rights of the States to whose taxable values these lands would otherwise have added? No well-informed man will deny that to the operation of the homestead laws, perhaps more than any other one thing, is due the wonderful development and progress of the West.

When the act of March 3, 1901, was passed vesting in the President the power to make these reservations, no general notice was taken of the fact in the State of Arkansas, for the reason that until then but a few people were aware that enough public lands of the required character were lying contiguous in the State to constitute a reserve of any consequence. Still fewer conceived the idea that the public good required the segregation of the lands for such a purpose. When the proclamation of the President attracted general attention to the fact, most people were inclined to look with apprehension upon the movement. The fact is well known to the people of that State that a large per cent of the lands embraced in these reserves are susceptible of a high state of cultivation in the ordinary crops of the country, and a still larger per cent would maintain orchards and vineyards of the highest order. In short, the fact is that most of these lands can be made homes for the people. They are high and healthy and with an abundance of pure water and other conditions that invite settlement and development. The State, in advertising her resources and inviting immigration from overcrowded sections of the country, has pointed to her vast public domain as available for homestead entry and development. We have looked forward to the time when these lands should become the subject of private ownership and go upon the tax books of the counties in which they lie and contribute their share toward bearing the public burdens and maintaining the school systems of the State.
